CAREFUL WHAT YOU SAY.

Speaking of persons' faults,
Don't forget your own;
Rather, those with homes of glass
Should seldom throw a stone.
To have nothing else to do
Than talk of those who are
Better to commence at home—
And from that point begin.

We have no right to judge a man
Until he's fairly tried;
Until we feel like his company,
Know the world he walks
Or have faults—but who has not?
And as well as young.
We are busy for naught we know,
Every fifty to their one.

Be your of a better
Should it ever cross at well,
Or, when defects to cure,
Let faults I feel;
Remember, there hope to be
Than wrong. I know
Of a thousand I did me let
Of others' faults.

Speak of others
When we begin,
Blind or five
Lest the world may say
Of our little knots.
Mind your own business,
Keep your own house in order
Before you find fault
In the affairs of others.

THE SON'S RETURN.

Simeon Brown stood in the doorway of his father's kitchen, in the early dawn of a fair May morning, with a face shorn of all its wonted joyousness, like an autumnal forest, when the leaves have gone down behind the bleak, gray hills.

"I've got to go, mother," he said, at last, addressing a middle-aged woman, who stood folding a small parcel, before the closely-scoured dresser, "and I may as well go at once. Come, say good-bye!"

"Yes, you've got to go, an' it'll break your old mother's heart, Simeon, an' bring down her gray hairs in sorrow to the grave," she answered, in a petulant, grieving voice, as she put down the parcel, and came and stood before him.

"No, mother, no—don't talk so," he said, soothingly. "You know I'm obliged to go—it'll be the best for us all—we can't get on if we stay here."

"Yes, we can, Simeon—yes, we can. But you've got above your old home, an' your old mother, an' now—"

"Lisbeth!"

The voice of her husband silenced her querulous complaining, but she put her apron to her eyes, and rocked herself to and fro in the abandonment of utter despair.

"I shan't be gone long," continued Simeon, his voice trembling in spite of all his efforts to steady it, "not more than two years at the farthest, and then we'll all go, and have a nice little home together, and you shall call your last days your best ones."

Her face brightened up a little, but she asked, half in hope, half in fear—

"But if you fail, Simeon—if you fail, what then?"

A sudden shadow dashed out the sunlight from his brave, young face, but it returned again in an instant, and his broad chest expanded, and the muscular cord in his bronzed wrists worked visibly as he replied:

"I shall not fail, mother!"

His strong faith somewhat reassured her, and she looked up almost cheerfully.

"Well, maybe you won't, Simeon—I hope so, at any rate—you always was a good boy, an' I trust the Lord'll help you."

"I trust so, mother; the sun's most up; I must be on; take care of yourself while I'm gone; good-bye."

"Good-bye, Simeon, good-bye, my good boy—that never gave his old mother a cross word, or caused her a moment's trouble in his life—God bless you!"

He held her in his arms for a moment, and then turned to his father.

"Good bye, father; do the best you can until I return."

"Good-bye, my son—God's blessing go with you!"

"Here, Simeon, stop a moment!" called his mother, as he turned toward the door, "I'd most forgot 'em, an' I made 'em on purpose for you—some o' the seed cakes you always liked so well; think of your old mother when you eat 'em."

Simeon dropped the little package into his pocket, drew his hat over his eyes and stepped out.

Faith Hunter, his foster-sister, was awaiting him in the yard.

"I'm going down a little piece with you, Simeon," she said, "so you needn't bid me good-bye."

He drew her hand through his arm, and they walked on side by side, down the winding pathway, the dewy pastures and browsing kine around them, and overhead, the crystal heavens emblazoned with the saffron dawn tints of the opening day; she, waiting for him to speak first, and he irresolute as to what he should say.

There was in his heart, a great tide of feeling, which had been steadily deepening and gaining strength, ever since a sixth night sixteen years before, when his mother came home from the death-bed of a friendless widow, bringing with her a little, helpless babe, and told him that she was to be, from henceforth and forever, his sister. Ever she had been, and even more than a sister, perhaps, if such a thing be possible. Side by side they trod the flowery paths of childhood, sharing every pleasure and pain, and joy and sorrow, almost the same existence; hand-in-hand they entered upon an untried road of youthful anticipation; but now they were about to separate, and the mighty love, which had grown up in the youth's heart, and strengthened with his strength, was struggling fiercely for escape, but he resolutely kept it back. No matter if that timid little girl at his side was nearer to him than all the rest of the world, that his own life, even, he just not speak it to her then. She was nothing but a child, and he had no name, no inducement—nothing but his strong hands and brave young heart to offer her. Yet, how could he leave her, how could he go away, without some sigil assurance that he would not be quite forgotten?

His love was great and strong, and entwined itself about its object with an unyielding clasp that could not be torn away without almost uprooting life itself; he knew and felt it, and trembled at the bare possibility of being forgotten.

"Faith," he said, at last making an effort to steady his voice, 'do you know that I am sorrier to leave you than any one else, not even mother excepted?"

"Are you, Simeon?" she asked innocently, uplifting her trustful eyes to his face.

"Yes, I am Faith, and I want to know if you'll quite forget me when I'm gone away?"

"Why, how could I Simeon, when you've been so good and kind to me? No, indeed, I shall never forget you!"

"And you will be glad to see me when I come back, Faith?"

"Why, to be sure, Simeon; what makes you ask?"

"Because I want to know—you're sure you'll be glad?"

"Very sure, Simeon."

"Very well, I shall be back in a year or so, and I shall expect you to keep your promise."

"I shall keep it—and you've given me so much, little things, that I want to give you something, and I've nothing else but this—it's my little Bible—I want you to take it, Simeon, and think of me when you read it."

His strong hand trembled as he unfolded the little package. It was a pretty, delicate thing, daintily bound in morocco, with a silver clasp, and inscribed with the simple word, 'Faith.' His eyes filled up with tears as he looked at it.

"I don't know how to thank you for this, Faith—why, it almost seems like carrying you with me, since it's got your name on it. I'll read it every day, and always keep it here, Faith," he said, tremuously, dropping it in his breast pocket, and buttoning up his coat, as if he wanted it close to his heart.

By this time they had reached the gate—the old red gate upon which they had swung together a thousand times in their happy childhood.

"I must go back now, mother," said Faith, struggling hard to keep back her tears. 'Aunt Lisbeth will want me to help her about the milking. Good-bye."

"Good-bye, Faith. Take care of yourself and mother.

He tore his hand from her lingering clasp, threw his knapsack across his shoulders, the old red gate, closing with a ringing clang, and Faith turned tearfully homward.

* * *

A chill November wind tossed and whirled the dry elm leaves on the common in front of Reuben Brown's cottage, and blew the thin gray locks about his forehead, as he stood in the yard harnessing up the old-fashioned bonnet-topped buggy.

"Hadn't you better have your yarn mittens, Reuben?" called his wife from the doorway, "the air bites right sharp, an' we'll have snow before night; I can tell by the way the wind blows."

"Maybe I had, wife," he replied, gathering up the reins, and mounting the creaking seat.

"Run, Faith, for Reuben's yarn mittens; they're under the lounge in the back room—hurry, child!"

Faith ran out, her pretty curls blown all about her face, and climbing up on the wheel, held the reins until the old man drew the mittens on.

"Hurry back, Reuben," called Lisbeth. "I don't want my Thanksgiving dinner to spile with waitin."

"Aye, aye, wife!"

Old Dobbin pricked up his ears and started forward; the old-fashioned buggy went creaking down the lane, and was soon lost to sight behind the swaying elm boughs.

"Now, Faith,' said Lisbeth, tucking up her sleeves, and kneading down the linen apron, 'if ever we were spry in our lives, let's be this morning. They'll be home by two o'clock, and it's most ten now, an' there's the bird to roast, an' the turkey, an' the mince pies to bake—an' goodness me, I wonder if the bread's rise? Yes, indeed, just as light as a feather! It's just the nicest thing in the world for Simeon to get home on Thanksgiving day, ain't it, Faith?"

Faith said, 'Yes, ma'am,' very quietly; and the happy woman went on—

"Poor Simmie, it's been many a day since his old mother cooked a dinner for him—an' he always liked my cookin'. 'Mother,' he used to say, 'I never saw any one cook things as nice as you can.' How happy he'll be, Faith, when you made that raisin cake yesterday. He always liked it, I remember, when he was almost a baby. I can see him now, with his brown curls all a-dancin' round his rosy face, and his little hands full of my dress an' say—'Mother, won't you have raisin cake Thanksgivin' day?' Bless his dear heart! The best boy that ever lived, he was! Never gave his old mother a cross word, or caused her a moment's trouble in his life! I know he'll enjoy his dinner. Chop up them apples, Faith, an' we'll have the pies on in no time."

Faith did as she was bidden, tripping round with a deft and quiet handiness that made her sweet face all the more attractive; and by twelve o'clock the huge turkey and the great round of beef were nicely browning, and the mince pies and the mammoth loaf of bread were fairly done.

"Gettin' on finely, Faith,' said Lisbeth, stirring and seasoning a bowl of gravy. 'We shall have dinner in good time. You may set the table now, and then go and dress yourself, child, and I'll put on my bonnet and shawl, and we'll go down the winding pathway, the dewy pastures and browsing kine around them, and overhead, the crystal heavens emblazoned with the saffron dawn tints of the opening day; she, waiting for him to speak first, and he irresolute as to what he should say.

There was in his heart, a great tide of feeling, which had been steadily deepening and gaining strength, ever since a sixth night sixteen years before, when his mother came home from the death-bed of a friendless widow, bringing with her a little, helpless babe, and told him that she was to be, from henceforth and forever, his sister. Ever she had been, and even more than a sister, perhaps, if such a thing be possible. Side by side they trod the flowery paths of childhood, sharing every pleasure and pain, and joy and sorrow, almost the same existence; hand-in-hand they entered upon an untried road of youthful anticipation; but now they were about to separate, and the mighty love, which had grown up in the youth's heart, and strengthened with his strength, was struggling fiercely for escape, but he resolutely kept it back. No matter if that timid little girl at his side was nearer to him than all the rest of the world, that his own life, even, he just not speak it to her then. She was nothing but a child, and he had no name, no inducement—nothing but his strong hands and brave young heart to offer her. Yet, how could he leave her, how could he go away, without some sigil assurance that he would not be quite forgotten?

His love was great and strong, and entwined itself about its object with an unyielding clasp that could not be torn away without almost uprooting life itself; he knew and felt it, and trembled at the bare possibility of being forgotten.

"Faith,' he said, at last making an effort to steady his voice, 'do you know that I am sorrier to leave you than any one else, not even mother excepted?'

'Are you, Simeon?' she asked innocently, uplifting her trustful eyes to his face.

'Yes, I am Faith, and I want to know if you'll quite forget me when I'm gone away?'

'Why, how could I Simeon, when you've been so good and kind to me? No, indeed, I shall never forget you!'

'And you will be glad to see me when I come back, Faith?'

'Why, to be sure, Simeon; what makes you ask?'

'Because I want to know—you're sure you'll be glad?'

"Very sure, Simeon.'

"Very well, I shall be back in a year or so, and I shall expect you to keep your promise.'

'I shall keep it—and you've given me so much, little things, that I want to give you something, and I've nothing else but this—it's my little Bible—I want you to take it, Simeon, and think of me when you read it.'

His strong hand trembled as he unfolded the little package. It was a pretty, delicate thing, daintily bound in morocco, with a silver clasp, and inscribed with the simple word, 'Faith.' His eyes filled up with tears as he looked at it.

"I don't know how to thank you for this, Faith—why, it almost seems like carrying you with me, since it's got your name on it. I'll read it every day, and always keep it here, Faith,' he said, tremuously, dropping it in his breast pocket, and buttoning up his coat, as if he wanted it close to his heart.

By this time they had reached the gate—the old red gate upon which they had swung together a thousand times in their happy childhood.

"I must go back now, mother,' said Faith, struggling hard to keep back her tears. 'Aunt Lisbeth will want me to help her about the milking. Good-bye.'

'Good-bye, Faith. Take care of yourself and mother.

He tore his hand from her lingering clasp, threw his knapsack across his shoulders, the old red gate, closing with a ringing clang, and Faith turned tearfully homward.

* * *

A chill November wind tossed and whirled the dry elm leaves on the common in front of Reuben Brown's cottage, and blew the thin gray locks about his forehead, as he stood in the yard harnessing up the old-fashioned bonnet-topped buggy.

"Hadn't you better have your yarn mittens, Reuben?' called his wife from the doorway, 'the air bites right sharp, an' we'll have snow before night; I can tell by the way the wind blows.'

'Maybe I had, wife,' he replied, gathering up the reins, and mounting the creaking seat.

'Run, Faith, for Reuben's yarn mittens; they're under the lounge in the back room—hurry, child!'

Faith ran out, her pretty curls blown all about her face, and climbing up on the wheel, held the reins until the old man drew the mittens on.'

'Hurry back, Reuben,' called Lisbeth. 'I don't want my Thanksgiving dinner to spile with waitin.'

'Aye, aye, wife!'

Old Dobbin pricked up his ears and started forward; the old-fashioned buggy went creaking down the lane, and was soon lost to sight behind the swaying elm boughs.

'Now, Faith,' said Lisbeth, tucking up her sleeves, and kneading down the linen apron, 'if ever we were spry in our lives, let's be this morning. They'll be home by two o'clock, and it's most ten now, an' there's the bird to roast, an' the turkey, an' the mince pies to bake—an' goodness me, I wonder if the bread's rise? Yes, indeed, just as light as a feather! It's just the nicest thing in the world for Simeon to get home on Thanksgiving day, ain't it, Faith?'

Faith said, 'Yes, ma'am,' very quietly; and the happy woman went on—

'Poor Simmie, it's been many a day since his old mother cooked a dinner for him—an' he always liked my cookin'. 'Mother,' he used to say, 'I never saw any one cook things as nice as you can.' How happy he'll be, Faith, when you made that raisin cake yesterday. He always liked it, I remember, when he was almost a baby. I can see him now, with his brown curls all a-dancin' round his rosy face, and his little hands full of my dress an' say—'Mother, won't you have raisin cake Thanksgivin' day?' Bless his dear heart! The best boy that ever lived he was! Never gave his old mother a cross word, or caused her a moment's trouble in his life! I know he'll enjoy his dinner. Chop up them apples, Faith, an' we'll have the pies on in no time.'

Faith did as she was bidden, tripping round with a deft and quiet handiness that made her sweet face all the more attractive; and by twelve o'clock the huge turkey and the great round of beef were nicely browning, and the mince pies and the mammoth loaf of bread were fairly done.

'Gettin' on finely, Faith,' said Lisbeth, stirring and seasoning a bowl of gravy. 'We shall have dinner in good time. You may set the table now, and then go and dress yourself, child, and I'll put on my bonnet and shawl, and we'll go down the winding pathway, the dewy pastures and browsing kine around them, and overhead, the crystal heavens emblazoned with the saffron dawn tints of the opening day; she, waiting for him to speak first, and he irresolute as to what he should say.

There was in his heart, a great tide of feeling, which had been steadily deepening and gaining strength, ever since a sixth night sixteen years before, when his mother came home from the death-bed of a friendless widow, bringing with her a little, helpless babe, and told him that she was to be, from henceforth and forever, his sister. Ever she had been, and even more than a sister, perhaps, if such a thing be possible. Side by side they trod the flowery paths of childhood, sharing every pleasure and pain, and joy and sorrow, almost the same existence; hand-in-hand they entered upon an untried road of youthful anticipation; but now they were about to separate, and the mighty love, which had grown up in the youth's heart, and strengthened with his strength, was struggling fiercely for escape, but he resolutely kept it back. No matter if that timid little girl at his side was nearer to him than all the rest of the world, that his own life, even, he just not speak it to her then. She was nothing but a child, and he had no name, no inducement—nothing but his strong hands and brave young heart to offer her. Yet, how could he leave her, how could he go away, without some sigil assurance that he would not be quite forgotten?

His love was great and strong, and entwined itself about its object with an unyielding clasp that could not be torn away without almost uprooting life itself; he knew and felt it, and trembled at the bare possibility of being forgotten.

"Faith,' he said, at last making an effort to steady his voice, 'do you know that I am sorrier to leave you than any one else, not even mother excepted?'

'Are you, Simeon?' she asked innocently, uplifting her trustful eyes to his face.

'Yes, I am Faith, and I want to know if you'll quite forget me when I'm gone away?'

'Why, how could I Simeon, when you've been so good and kind to me? No, indeed, I shall never forget you!'

'And you will be glad to see me when I come back, Faith?'

'Why, to be sure, Simeon; what makes you ask?'

'Because I want to know—you're sure you'll be glad?'

"Very sure, Simeon.'

way—kind o' mournful-like, jest before the great snowstorm, when the henhouse roof fell in and smashed all my poor chickens. Dear me! how fast it falls! I do wish I'd a' thought to send to Simeon that yarn tippet; he always was subject to sore throats, and this'll be sure to give him one. Where's his slippers, Faith—I made new ones, an' worked for him? Why don't you put 'em down to warm? He'll want 'em when he gets here."

Faith did this also, and then brought out her little work-basket, and sat down before the glowing hickory fire, making a great effort to appear calm. But it was all in vain; her tears would tremble and flutter, and her cotton tangle in a most amazing manner.

Four o'clock came, the snow descended in thick, heavy showers, and a cold easterly wind howled round the corners, leaving the frozen ground bare in some places, and in others, piling up the white drifts in great freezing masses. The sun had scarcely been visible all night, and the cattle flocked to the barnyard, and the pony came up to the bars and whinned for admittance; still they did not come.

The Thanksgiving dinner grew cold upon the table, and Lisbeth stood in the doorway, until the white flakes lay thickly on her garments.

"Something's the matter, Faith, she said, uneasily—'I know there is, they wouldn't stay this long if there wasn't.'

"The boat may have been delayed,' suggested Faith.

"Or the buggy—broken down! Reuben said one of the linchpins was loose. Dear me! it does look—the Thanksgivin' dinner'll be spiled after all our trouble.'

* * *

Another half-hour went by. The wind rose to a shrill blast, and the snow came down in smothering torrents. The chill, gray gloom of twilight began to settle down, when dimly visible to the eyes of the weary watchers, appeared the old bonnet-shaped top of the old-fashioned buggy.

"Here they come, Faith—here they come!' cried Lisbeth, springing down the steps—'Stir the fire, and let's run down to meet 'em. Poor Simeon, I know he's near froze.'

Faith sprang up, and in her excited haste overturned her work-basket, sending its contents in a miscellaneous flight over the smoothly-waxed floor, burned her fingers with the poker, came well-nigh scorching her new merino dress, and at last, reached the door, tearless, ran out to join Lisbeth.

The old buggy came on with a slow, uncertain motion, and, after several serious moments, paused at the little gate.

Lisbeth pressed forward, closely followed by Faith; but no eager face looked out to welcome them.

"Where's Simeon—where's my boy?' cried the fond mother. 'O, Faith, he hasn't come! Reuben, where's Simeon?'

But Reuben did not answer, or even make the slightest movement. With his face white and stony, his hands dangling helplessly beside him, he sat in the vehicle corner, staring out upon them with a vacant, unmeaning stare.

"Reuben, what's the matter?' almost screamed the frantic woman. 'Are you sick—dead—crazy? Oh, for heaven's sake, speak to me'

Slowly and almost mechanically he arose from his seat, and clambered out with feeble, tottering steps.

"Reuben, Reuben—speak to me!' continued Lisbeth, grasping his arm fiercely. 'Where's Simeon—why hasn't he come home?'

"He's gone—he'll never come home any more! never, never!' said the old man incoherently, groping with his hands in the pockets of his coat.

"Gone, Simeon gone!—my boy never come home any more! What do you mean, Reuben?

"Here it is,' he continue, in the same wandering tone; 'here it all is! He'll never come home any more'

Faith peered the paper from his shivering hands, and following his pointed finger, read in the deepening twilight:

"By telegraph from S— The steamer Ocean Queen, that left this wharf at six o'clock this morning, took fire on the passage. Although prompt and vigorous efforts were made to rescue the passengers, owing to the suddenness of the catastrophe only two were saved.'

"Simeon was one of them; he was one of the two,' she said, her face blanching and her lips growing rigid.

'No, no—I've seen 'em both; he'll never come home any more.'

'What is it?' cried Lisbeth, still unconscious of the dreadful truth, her voice dropping down to a tone of piteous entreaty, 'where is Simeon—where's my boy? tell me he's not dead, and I can bear anything else.'

But Reuben did not answer, for tears rolled over his wrinkled face, and it was enough.

* * *

The storm swelled higher and higher, and towards midnight, raged around the little New England cottage with appalling fury. The kitchen fire had burned down to a few flickering embers, which threw a fitful glow over the Thanksgiving table, and over the bowed heads of the three disconsolate mourners is they sat there in their terrible desolation.

This was their Thanksgiving day, begun in hope and joyous anticipation, but ended in the very blackness of utter despair.

"Oh, I can't stand it,' sobbed Lisbeth; 'I can't, I can't; it's cruel—wicked—wrong. He was all I had—my only child—my darling, precious boy, that never gave his old mother a cross word, or caused her a moment's trouble in his life; my baby, that used to sleep in my bosom and lay his little head against my cheek—and now he's in the river—in the cold, black water, and we're here, living, thinking, breathing, by the warm fire. Oh, I can't stand it, I can't; I wish I could die and end my misery."

Reuben was too deeply affected by this sudden outpush of a mother's grief to speak a single word of comfort, and his own heart was too deeply wounded. For a few moments the three sat side by side in sorrowful silence; then the old man rose up and taking down the family Bible, opened it and read: 'Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.'

Precious, life-giving words. We read them night and morning, and hear them read in the Sabbath, from the sacred desk, yet never know their full meaning, their true consolation, until some great calamity sweeps away every earthly prop and stay, and we have nothing else to lean upon. All this was felt in that little New England cottage, as the old man's voice rose up like a sighing breeze in the dim of the winter tempest, and on the great surging deep of their hearts fell a sad but peaceful calm.

Still the storm raged on; the winds rose and fell and whistled round the gables, driving the snow before them in great freezing drifts. It would soon be morning; rose and gold and purple would glow in the eastern heavens and disperse the storm and darkness; but over the night of their desolation, no morning would ever break. Was that a step in the hall, a form at the door in the tempest? A step surely, for it comes on, crunching through the freezing drifts, and pauses on the step with a quick, determined sound. And now there is a rap, short, sudden and eager.

Reuben rises; it is some of the neighbors with tidings of the lost steamer; he would that the body of his boy had been found, perhaps. He opens the door—the wind sweeps in, bringing with it a cutting shower of sleet, and also a happy, hopeful face.

"How are you, father?

The resonant voice rings through the silent gloom like a peal of sudden joy, and the old man hears it and falls forward in his son's embrace; the poor mother hears it, and rushes forward half frantic with delight; Faith hears it in her solitude of her little chamber, and hastens out, her sweet face alternating between smiles and tears.

"Oh, Simeon—oh, my good boy—they told me you was dead, drowned, lost in the river; they nearly broke your old mother's heart, but you wouldn't let 'em; you've come back, Simeon, never to leave me again."

"Never to leave you again, mother—God willing." He held her to his bosom for a moment, and then went round to where Faith stood.

"Well, Faith, mother, he said, his voice vibrating with suppressed emotion, as he took the young girl's hand, 'let me tell you of my deliverance—for I consider it a deliverance from the jaws of death. It was God's providence first, and next to that, Faith's little Bible. She gave it to me the morning we parted, and I always kept it about me, and it proved a precious talisman. I went on board the Ocean Queen this morning, with the rest of the poor passengers, just as she was leaving the wharf, I found, to my cost, I had left my overcoat hanging on the railing on the bridge. I didn't care for the coat, but my Bible was in the pocket, and I could not part with that. So I jumped ashore just as the boat pushed off. And now, father,' he continued, turning to the old man, who sat in his mother's arms, with clasped hands and streaming tears, 'i will now say, with your permission, that which my heart has long felt. I have succeeded in my profession, even beyond my sanguine expectations; in the far West a comfortable home awaits us, surrounded by fertile acres sufficient to yield us all we need, and more. I have always loved you, ever since that winter night when mother brought you home to be my little sister. Be mine than sister now—be my wife, Faith."

The auburn head went down upon his shoulder like a flash of sunlight. Lisbeth stood in silence, unable to comprehend the scene, but after a while the happy truth burst upon her, and she clasped her arms about them with a joyful cry: 'My own precious children, and we shall all live together, and never part again, ain't we, Simeon?'

"Never part again, mother, until death parts us,' said the young man, solemnly.

"Well, this new slippers, Faith,' cried the happy mother, laughing and crying by turns, 'they'll be all the more acceptable now—think a heap of 'em, Simeon—she most worked her eyes out ever 'em.'

Simeon put on the velvet slippers, and sat down in his old place.

"Now, Faith, run for the gravy; while I stir up the fire; we'll have our Thanksgiving dinner after all.'

"Thanksgiving breakfast I should call it,' laughed Simeon.

"Well, it'll do just as well—we've seen a great many in our day, but this'll be the happiest one of all, won't Reuben?'

"The happiest one of all, Lisbeth,' said the old man, smiling through his tears.

Woman's Mission.

Man loves the rugged paths, and climbs by and a full bloom meets him unmoved, but the moment that leaves the mountain, and the moment that leaves the moon when emerging from behind a cloud, or in the sunrise or meridian, or in the shadows of the evening, he meets what shade is to a figure in painting, gives boldness and prominence. Nothing adds more to a male beauty than modesty. It is the crown of his manhood, the light which is borrowed from virtue. Boldness has given the sex the whole kingdom of the white rose—modesty, the "maiden blush." This pure and delicate hue is the only paint Christian virtue should use. It is the fine enamel of a woman without modesty is like a faded flower diffusing an unwholesome odor, instead of a sweet perfume. Modesty is to woman what honor is to man, the jewel of the soul, which beams and dies in a few hours; but modesty gives the female charms which lasting as the place of the transitory freshness of youth.

Wanted a Job.

Mr. Winterhalter of Detroit sends us a most interesting series of letters to the Post and Tribune. In his last is the following concerning our only naval station in the Pacific coast:

Vallejo is now a place deriving its chief interest and support from the navy yard, from which it is separated by the straits of Mare Island, a quarter of a mile wide.

Mare Island derived its name from the following circumstance: Formally a raft made of barrels and boards was the only ferry across the straits of Karquinez to the south'ard of the island. One day a number of animals, among them a mare, the favorite horse of Gen. Vallejo, were being ferried over to the city, when a squall struck and capsized the ferry. Some of the animals escaped by swimming ashore. Among the saved was the General's mare, which landed on the southern end of the Island. The island was ever dubbed it "Isla de la Yegua," which we have translated.

The navy yard bears the distinction of having been established under the personal auspices of Jeff Davis, and for four years, beginning in 1854, labored to make it a yard useful as well as ornamental. In Rotten Row, (an appropriate name for the place where the vessels are laid up, are lying the Cyane, Monongahela, Saco, Tuscarora, Benecia and Nyack. Besides, there are the Narragansett and Mohican. The Independence is receiving-ship, and the Liquois was fitting out for the South Pacific, which station she has since been joined. In Vallejo lies the unemployed midshipman, an unknown quantity, from the time of Robeson's administration of the navy. These old hulks could many a tale unfold. The Cyane was instrumental in bringing the conquering during the Mexican war this same California, within whose limits she has now found a peaceful resting-place. The Saco and Cyane are both connected with that of the Constitution. The two ships were captured by 'old Ironsides' during the war of 1812. Of the two, the Saco was broken up in Philadelphia in 1836; the Levant was lost in the Pacific, 1860, with all on board. The "new" Cyane, a sister ship, 29 guns, was launched in 1837. Her independence, too, has a history, being older than all the others. She was one of the first ships ever built at the Boston navy yard, was launched in a 74-gun ship in 1841, and was in 1856. Taking part in the conquest of California as the flag-ship of Commodore Stimbrick, who relieved Commodore Jones, she captured a Mexican ship and launch.

The very first Independence we read about was a sloop of 10 guns, purchased by the continental congress and supposed to have been destroyed by the Delaware in 1777 to prevent falling into the enemy's hands. The Monongahela, on whose bridge, while attempting to land in Fort Hussion, on Aug. 7, McKinstry was wounded, after being Farragut's flag-ship for a few weeks on the Mississippi, and after following the Admiral's flag into Mobile and through the great fight, after being beached by a tidal wave in Santa Cruz, and going through taps and mishaps in every clime, has come to rest her weary frame at this yard.

Much might be told about this navy yard. The buildings, which are mostly substantial two-story brick houses, include foundry and machine shop, construction shops, blacksmith and iron-plating shops, sail and rigging lofts, officers' quarters, a but dignified and well-kept hospital, the finest hospital and many smaller structures. Gas is furnished the yard by an Otto silent gas engine of four horse power, which pumps it over from Vallejo.

Twelve hundred men have at one time found employment in the yard, but the force averages five hundred. Many of these own boats to pass across to Vallejo. At noon the vessels of this "mosquito fleet" are seen darting across the straits, while other workmen lay up the Mare Island.

For some years a stone dry dock has been in process of construction, to cost $2,500,000, to be 500 feet long over all and capable of docking vessels of 450 feet. At present a sectional dry dock is in working order and receives all vessels of the Pacific station that require repairs below the water line.

The First Propelers.

The first propellers ever built in this country, and, as far as I know, the first iron hulls, were the Anthracite and the Black Diamond, built on the plans of Capt. Ericsson, and employed in carrying coal through the Delaware and Raritan canal. The first sea-going propeller built in this country was the Frigate Princeton, built on Captain Ericsson's designs, under the direction of Captain Stockton. It was a full-rigged sailing ship, the intention being to use steam only as auxiliary. It should not be forgotten that John Stevens, almost eighty years ago, built a small boat with two propellers, or 'circular sculls,' as he called them, and ran it about the harbor of New York. It is wonderful how near his blades approach the angle which experience has shown to be the best. He used a small engine of his own design, and, as he called, such as was reinvented by Booth a quarter of a century later, at Liverpool—Ashbel Welsh.

An Alabama humorist writes: "Why can't people cultivate sociability and good nature? Here was a man the other day got letting mad and organized a riot just because a fellow who sat behind him at a theatre put his feet up on his shoulder, and spit in his high hat. Some men have got such mean and unsympathetic natures that they can't bear a little genial humor in their fellow-beings."

DELEVAN, WIS., Sept. 24, 1878.

GENTS—I have taken not quite one bottle of your Hop Bitters. I was a feeble old man of 78 when I got it. To-day I am as active and feel as well as I did at 30. I see a great many that need such a medicine.

D. BOYCE.

Three thousand Glasgow ship joiners on strike.

What it Did for an Old Lady.

COSHOCTON STATION, N. Y.,
Dec. 26, 1878.

GENTS—A number of people had been using your Hop Bitters here, and with marked effect. In one case, a lady of over seventy years had been sick for years, and for the past ten years has not walked out of her room half the time. About six months ago she got so feeble she was helpless. Her old remedies, or physicians, being of no avail, I sent to Depot, Cortlandville, and got a bottle of Hop Bitters. It improved her so she was able to dress herself and walk about the house. When she had taken the second bottle she was able to take care of her own room and walk out to her neighbor's, and has improved all the time since. My wife and children also have derived great benefit from their use.

W. B. HATHAWAY
Agt. U. S. Ex. Co.

The person who is good for making excuses is seldom good for anything else.

ON THE COMPLEXION.

Without going into any aesthetic raptures in regard to personal beauty, it must be admitted by all that a pure and clear complexion often makes up for plain features, while a rough and sallow skin, or freckly face, mars the most perfect Grecian profile that was ever modeled from Nature's art gallery; but when a fresh, clear, transparent and brilliant complexion is combined with a classical pleasing countenance, lustrous eye, and graceful form, the effect becomes enraptured with the beautiful association, and we lovely is the involuntary exclamation made by all who gaze upon this rare combination of nature's choicest gift to the human family. A clear complexion is a fair evidence of pure blood and sound health; and although there are many who try to improve the complexion by extraneous means, it is of little or no use, unless the cause of the mischief has been reached, and the blood purified; in fact, all must be sham dones, and nature resented to. All, therefore, who are anxious to possess a white, soft and smooth skin, with a real peachy bloom so much admired, must not depend upon cosmetics, powders, or paints; their object should be to get the blood pure first, which can be done easily, quickly, and safely, by Nature's own remedies, Burdock Blood Bitters, which gives a healthy tone to the system, and a fair complexion to the countenance.

Sold by all druggists. WILLIAMS & CO., Wholesale Agents, Detroit, Mich.

The love of glory can only create a hero; the contempt of it creates a great man.

A Baptist Minister's Experience.

I am a Baptist Minister, and before I even thought of being a clergyman, I graduated in Medicine, and had a lucrative practice for my present profession, for years before. I was for years past a sufferer from quinsy, "THOMAS ECLECTRIC OIL" was recommended. I was troubled with boat-sores, and "Thomas' Eclectric Oil" cured them in a few days. I was also troubled with diphtheria and "Thomas' Eclectric Oil cured me in a few days. I also had a child with croup, and "Thomas' Eclectric Oil" cured it in a short time. I consider it the best cure for the most obstinate cases of croup, and I prefer it to all other remedies. I have had a bad foot for years, and "Thomas' Eclectric Oil" has cured it. I have also used it in my family for all kinds of bruises and sprains, and it has never failed to give perfect satisfaction. I do not hesitate to say that I believe the Thomas' Eclectric Oil is the best medicine that I have ever met with, and I have tried it in my business for any consideration. I am now suffering with a pain like rheumatism in my left side, and I believe the Thomas' Eclectric Oil will cure me.

DR. E. F. CRANE,
Corry, Pa.

We must learn to submit with grace, to commit the follies which depend upon character.

Is your hair falling out or your scalp diseased? Carboline, a deodorized extract of petroleum, is now improved and perfected; in that the article now offered in a bottle, and like thousands who are using it all over the country will attest, is the choicest of all toilet preparations.

The mind is like a trunk. Well packed it holds almost everything; if ill packed next to nothing.

Rescued From Death.

William J. Coughlin of Somerville, Mass., says: "In the fall of 1876 I was taken with a severe cough, followed by a most severe cough. I lost my appetite and flesh, and was confined to my bed. In 1877 I was admitted to the hospital. The doctor said I had a hole in my lung as big as a half-dollar. At one time a report went out that I was dead. I gave up hope, but a friend told me of DR. WILLIAM HALL'S BALSAM for the Lungs. Ask druggist for it. I did so, and for a bottle, when to my surprise, I commenced to feel better, and to-day I feel better than for three years past.

I write this hoping every one afflicted with Consumption, Asthma, or Lung Disease, take DR. WILLIAM HALL'S BALSAM, and be convinced that CONSUMPTION IS NOT CURABLE. I can positively say it has done more good than all other medicines I have taken since my sickness.

Fresh Fruits, Canned Fruits and Vegetables. Whole sale drug co. Foreign and Domestic Fruits. 53, 55 Clinton St. Chicago. Ill.

Clerks Boys 3 Lovely Ad. Cards and a New Oil Chromo, 10c. Gem Printing Co. Syracuse, N. Y.

YOUNG MEN: you want to learn telegraphy in 6 months and secure a situation, address, MERIDIAN TELEGRAPH CO., Meridian, Conn.

Education should be possessed by every young man and woman. Address Spencerian Business College, Grand Rapids, Mich. Business Colleges. Write for Catalogue. Journal—sent free.

BILLIARD TABLES.

Catalogue for our prices and illustrated catalogue. SCHUENEURG MFG. CO., DETROIT, MICH.

A WONDERFUL DISCOVERY. Sent on receipt of 25 cts. in stamps, a Receipt for a Hair Tonic, which in 3 to 6 months will produce a luxuriant growth of Hair on a bald head, or Whiskers on a smooth face. Address, Lock Box 1342, Boston, Mass. Beware of all imitations.

TEAS. Direct importers of best teas. Price lists free. Agents wanted. Great inducements. Wm. Ware & Co., Box 1287, Boston, Mass.

Best Tea on Earth. Send for Circular. Agents Wanted Everywhere. Our Prices are Less than Others. Gunpowder Tea 50 cts. per lb. Fine Black or Mixed, for $1 lb. Fine Black or Mixed, for $1 lb. Best Japan, $1 lb. Best Oolong, $1 lb. Best Imperial, $1 lb. Best Young Hyson, $1 lb. Send for pound sample, 12 cts. extra for postage. Best Coffee in the City, 25 cts. per lb. Best Baking Powder, 40 cts. per lb. Spices, everybody. Colored Tea Dishes to Agents. Great Inducements. Tea Pots, Sugars, Creams, Spoons, Butter Dishes, Pickle Jars, Vases, Ewers, Pitchers, Lamps, Clocks, Watches, Jewelry, Silver Plated Ware, Tea Trays, Tea Kettles, Tea Boilers, Tea Urns, Bronzes, Bronze Statuettes, Bronze Statuettes, Bronze Statuett