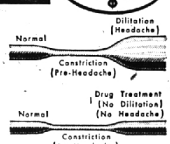
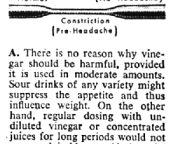
Migraine Explained

● Vinegar





Q. Would you please explain migraine headache?—R.W.

A. Migraine headache is a special kind of head pain which occurs at more or less regular intervals. In some persons the attack may start with some type of transient disturbance of vision. There may be other warning symptoms such as chills, sweating or dizziness. The headache, often involving only one side of the head, soon follows and may be associated with nausea and vomiting. The neck and head muscles are often tense and painful during and after a migraine attack. The warning symptoms are possibly due to constriction of head arteries. The headache itself is thought to be produced by dilatation of the vessels which stimulate nerves in the vessel walls. Treatment prescribed by doctors is directed toward preventing attacks through use of drugs. At the present time there is no completely effective cure.

Q. Is cider vinegar harmful? Does taking it regularly reduce weight?

A. There is no reason why vinegar should be harmful, provided it is used in moderate amounts. Sour drinks of any variety might suppress the appetite and thus influence weight. On the other hand, regular dosing with undiluted vinegar or concentrated juices for long periods would not seem advisable considering the possible irritating effects on the lining membrane of the stomach and intestines.

Answers do not necessarily reflect the opinion of all doctors. The diagnosis and treatment of disease is the function of the patient's personal physician.
