THANKSGIVING.

BY ROSE TERRY COOKE.

There is a new song in my lips,
A song that fits to-day,
The music of a quiet stream
Upon its onward way—
The monotone of such content,
Such a calm life is lived.
The song a tiny river sings
That through a meadow glides,
Half hidden by the waving grass,
Its level course divides;
At last forgetful of the hills
That vexed it long in infant rills.

Not yet its chant of victory
Go echoes from the shore;
Not yet is all its duty done,
Its rush and labor o'er;
But ocean much every day,
And bright is life that glides away.

A little hymn of gratitude,
Like bird-songs from their nest,
My heart must fashion into speech
And utter from its rest
A tender voice of thankfulness
For love that lovest most to bless.

The slow speech of a weary child
That, wandering lost and lone,
Comes unaware on home at last
And, nestled in its arms,
Wrapped all at once in warmth and peace,
Where all the storm and straying cease.

Ah! can it be, at last, at last,
The time of toil and tears,
Of bitter trouble overpast,
That hope again appears!
That after all these years of strife
I live to thank thee, Lord, for life!

To gather up the broken clue
And read the path aright
With quiet hope and thankfulness
I trod so long with pain.
To trust again with such a faith
As once was wounded into death!

Lord, keep me closer at thy side
As life has sweeter grown,
Lest I forget in this content
The hand beneath the rose
That, dear as home and love may be,
I find them still most dear with Thee.

THANKSGIVING THEN.

Remembered for Polly.

BY ROSE TERRY COOKE.

Get up in my lap, Polly, and I'll tell you all about Thanksgiv ing when I was a little girl, just me! that is, about ago, and sometimes mamma thinks there will never be any more such days, e en for you little girls. But, after all, I know you do have nice times now.

I must begin with my grandmother's kitchen for I know you will never see a kitchen like that. It was large and l w, with two windows opening on to the back yard, out of whose green, shady grass it was used to watch the pigeons and the cats and see what Hiram was doing at the barn, where it was too cold for me to be on the wood-pile or in the carriage house. There were all sorts of closets and cupboards about the kitchen, and a sink-room and kettle-room opening out of it, and beyond these a well-room. But the queerest bit of all it was the fireplace. It was very wide, indeed—so wide you could sit in each corner and l ok up the chimney to the sky. The fire was in the middle, and was made of big logs piled up on great iron andirons. Over it was an iron thing called a crane, a flat, strong bar of iron, that swung of and on, so on could put on the kettle without burning your arms in the same, and then swing them back to their place. They were hung on hooks, and these hooks put into short chains, like the other hooks which held them on the crane, so the pot-hooks could be put in higher or lower just as was needed. There was a baker-kettle stood in one corner of the chimney, and a charcoal furnace in the other, so that you could cook a great many things at once. What fun we children did have at that fireplace, when he cook was good natured. We used to tie apples to strings, and then fasten the strings to the shelf above and roast apples by the fire and drip into saucers. We used to melt loaf-sugar in little w re baskets tied to just such strings, and see it run into tempered pans, making cakes of clear amber candy. We hawed frozen apples in the dish-hot in the roasted ones, and ate leaning them against the andirons. We always begged the pigs' tails at "killing time," and, rolling them in brown paper, baked them in the hot ashes. They never were good, nobody ever ate them but we persisted in doing it year after year. But I am forgetting Thanksgiving. In those days we always began to get ready for it on Monday; for there were so many people to come—aunts and uncles and cousins—and they must have more than they could possibly eat, or it would not be Thanksgiving. So Monday we began to stone raisins and cut up citron. My sister and I tired with my grandfather, and we had other cousins in the same town, who came there every day; and I can tell you little girls and boys were m ie useful then. I often wonder what you would do in these days if you had to help as much as we did. We stoned raisins, and picked over cranberries, and washed Zante currants, and sliced citron, in that great kettle of mine, scched. Sometimes I had to run up and down hill to the dressmakers, for if I had a new winter dress, it was always made for Thanksgiving, and so was my winter hood and hat. Monday the cake was made and the cranberry sauce. Never see such cranberry sauce now. It was hard as jelly and poured into molds which turned out stiff and smoo h. But Monday was not so nice a day as Tuesday, for then we had to peel apples by pail quarter and core, so they could be sweet and strained and spiced for the next day; great big stewed apples to put up for the pot, and then the delight of seeing them rubbed in soft streams through the sieve, immense to go into the pudd ings, and eggs to beat for the cake-foot jelly, that was a long time in making, and was at last poured into odd, old-fashioned jelly-glasses, where it looked like white wine. To-day also bread was made and baked. The great brick oven cracked and roared a long time, then it was cleansed of its coals and swept with a damp broom, and then one after another the white swelling loaves were put in, the pans pushed to the end by a large flat shovel, with a very long handle, called a slice. Then Mary filled a stone jar with baking pears put in a cup of molasses and two or three of water, put on the cover, and fastened it down all round with a roll of dough. This went into the oven when the bread came out, and stayed there till next morning. By that time the pears were soft and deep red, and the jar half filled with syrup. Sometired we were Tuesday night. But we did not mind tire, for Thanksgiving was coming. And really next day it began to come, for this was pie day. There in the kitchen Grandmother could be heard long before breakfast pounding the crust on her rolling-pin, while the big oven flamed and roared; and Mary baked biscuit in a little tin oven before the fire, or toasted shortcake on a pewter platter, set up against a screen and held in place by a stick, browned and crisped another fire, for the bright blaze. Then, when we had done breakfast, I used to tuck myself into a corner and look on and run of errands. I went for nutmegs, for cinnamon, for lemons, for eggs, more sugar, for milk and spoons and spices; but I was more than paid if I could only see Grandmother roll its thin crust out, lay it so neatly over the dishes, shave off the edge so close, and then, after filling it with the apples, or yellow, or cream mixture, before her in big bowls, cut strips of paste with the dough-spur and ornament their surfaces. What a world of skill it was to set those pies in the oven and never spill a drop or slop the broad edges of crust and leave a smear! How delicious they smelled when they came out, glazed and crisp, and so full to melt in your mouth like the cream-puffs of Boulevard Rousset.

And all this time somebody else has been setting up chickens, and packing their plenty jellies and pickles away in a place for the chicken pie. There they simmer, being now and then tormented with a fork, to see if they are done, and while Grandmother makes more crust and pounds it into a Trojan, it is the old sewing-woman used to say. Now the last pies are out and set on the buttery shelves—almost forty of them, as well as a small girl can count, rising on tiptoe and stretching her neck to see. There are cranberry tarts—a delicate cream-colored rive; smash jes (which we always called pucking pies, their pale yellow subs ance savory with ginger, cinnamon and cream and eggs, besides the a sual Marlboro' puddings, rich enough to give an ele hant dyspepsia, and which in my secret I always thought were made of pomatum, they looked so clear and yellow and tasted so of lemon-peel—just as pomatum smells. Mince pies were never made in our house till Christmas, but we had covered apple pies, where the apples were piled in with just sugar or spice, till the covered crust looked like a bag of wa nuts. And, when these were baked, that upper crust was lifted off and the inside carefully stirred with butter, sugar and nutmeg and then the top replaced. This was a delightful performance to be beheld. Now was the chicken pie's turn. The oven was re-heated and the great pastry, in its deep yellow dish, set to bake, adorned with twists and curlicues or every sort, and a hole left in the top, much as my mother cuts it now. The guests might come, and come they did—some from the river-boat, where they had spent a long week in a room from the stage, that rattled and rumbled up to the door, and unloaded there most bundles and baskets, than it ought to have held. And oh! what fun it was to hear the bouncing with fresh voices; to see some handsome old grandfather welcoming them all so heartily to his fire-side in the spare room and in the dining room; to see the table with an extra leaf for extra guests; and see them all enjoy the bread and butter, the hot cake, the cookies, the dried beef, the pears and cream, that nobody ever got so nice anywhere but at grandmother's house. And when there was the last delight of the day, to see mother, just as I was dropping off into sleep, standing alone to the lamp to taste in a bit of old lace into the throat of my green merino dress and pin on the front her mother's brooch of rough Carolina gold. Oh! my mother!

Are you tired, Polly? "Teep on." It is well for mamma it has her little girl likes "talkeeng stories," as the Indians say; for those days are ver fresh in my mind, and sometimes I can't help er ing when I think about them and then I forget how much I have said. But the next day is Thanksgiving. Grandmother is down early, and a big bright fire is made ready; and there is sweet, gentle Aunt Clara, with the baby beside her knee, and smile and a kiss for me, if she takes there are half a dozen cousins and five or six other aunts and uncles; and I get into a corner and sit still, for I am very quiet, but I couldn't say so, possibly. So; get out of sight all I can, swallow my breath fast, and am happy as the robin on the table with paper boats and handkerchief babies and my dearest cousin Tat, who doesn't mind my being in the way, I think; when mother comes for me to be washed and dressed and go to church. I'd like to stay home and a gamed. He has taken ports, and conquered rebels and been tried about the Indians from pilot to post, and been praised by the newspapers and honored by the country; but I asks him not long ago if he remembered how we played boats under the table, and he laughed and said he did.

I'm sorry to say I didn't like to be washed and dressed and go to church, Polly. My mother was a little, little bit of a woman, and strong of her hands, and soap got into my eyes, and my hair dragged in dreadfully tight pig-tails. I wanted to stay at home, and see the big turkey roasted in the roaster. I should have liked to baste him through the lid behind the fire with the spring, and the bird of Hancox and two little sons, from New Hamp hire, lying there. I used to wonder if the Pilgrims had turkeys and have burdocks grow over them. I never did I ke burdo ks. Then I looked around at the Pilgrims people, and got a good deal, and slid down into my seat and heard Dr. Hawes come to very near the end, and say "finally." Then I brightened up, and pretty soon the sung a hymn out of Dwight's hymn book: and old Mrs. Hiram, the widows slip, rose up. She ha a very queer, cracked voice, and I used to wonder what made her sing. But there was only one to hear her, and every anthems and set pieces, very loud and long. So was the sermon. The Doctor thumped the cushions and made a deal of noise; and I did not know about bottles, and got so tired. It seemed to me very hard that we had to go to church on a week day. But I suppose they wanted us out of the way of cooking. When we got back there was the long table all set out with silver and glass and china; the big bunch of celery in the middle, in its sparkling glass vase; the molds of crimson cranberry at the corners; decanters of bright wine at different end, the hams, starred with cloves, at one side and a pair of cold tongues on the other; little dishes of picked mushrooms, mangoes, and butternuts standing interspersed about; and on the sideboard such an array of pies and jellies and nuts and almonds and raisins and figs as a mighty make four desserts to-day. But then people liked to eat and drink. They had great fires and rattling windows, and so plenty of fresh air. There was Grandfather in his knee breeches and queer old fashioned coat, with all the silver buttons glittering and clambering round him, there was Grandmother, with her brown silk dress and best cap on; eyes of soft thread lace about her face and throat, the pretty young aunts, dressed for the day, and the married aunts, talking to each other about their children and servants and husbands, much as married aunts do still; and there were the little cousins, looking a little as if they wished the dinner would hurry, just so that then there was one little table—for we children always had a table to ourselves—with a set of small dishes on it. And sometimes I sat at the head, if Kate were not there, for she was older than I; but I went always sat at the foot, being alwa s there and the oldest of us all. What fun we had; and how hard it was to say what we would have to eat, for we had dinner and supper, too, and pretty soon the table was loaded with turkey, and roast ducks, and chicken pie, and jellies and creams, and almost all the cold meats and I knew mother's beautiful dark eyes kept good watch over my little daughters, for fear of next day's headache, for even then I had headache. The other little girls had fathers to see to them, and I was near always gone away. How nice it was to eat the pies just like a grown-up woman, and to have a little glass of wine as we played at being grown up! We know now that it isn't play to be men and women, and we do it as much better than even. You shut her blue eyes long ago and laid her fair hair down to sleep far away in the west. Kate's bright, dark beauty, "her cheeks like roses and her eyes like aloes," as an old people used to say, is there, too, and a great ri-er sings to her rest. Charley lies by the Gulf of Mexico and those of us who still live are scattered from shore to shore—king, wide miles lie between us; and between some rolls a deeper ocean than Atlantic or Gulf. If ever it is bridged, there will be a Thanksgiving in heaven and on earth both.

But Mamma is getting too sober for you, Polly. "What makes me cry?" Why, little girl, don't you think grown people ever cry? We never used to Thanksgiving Day, for after dinner we felt horribly dull. We had all eaten too much, to tell the truth, and it was cold outdoors and getting dark by this time. A few of the courageous went out to the barn, and got into the ark, as we called the old family coach, that we never had seen used in our lives. There we jumped, and screamed, and laughed, and played to go to ride; but I never liked it much. There was a musty smell of old cushions and dried up leather, besides the shable coach, and there were cobwebs and dust, and oh, horrors! I was afraid, mice. But by and by came tea-time. I don't think people ate anything only broad and cut and butter and longed for the table to be cleared; for then we all had games—very quiet ones, to be sure, on the old pe ple could help us. "Twenty questions," or "What is my thought like?" or we capped verses, or Grandfather I used to sound "little Robby and old Rose the dog," and sung, "Did you ever, ever, ever see a man eat a whale?"

Then the dear Aunt Kat, who was always ready to make us children happy would perform her wonderful feat of juggler's trick—eating a bit of lighted candle. How we stared never finding out for you, then the candle was e.t out of as apple and had a bit of wax t meat for wick. Then she melted sugar in the candle and it dropped. It on white pa er for us. She played the game of hu.n in for on a queer old parchment sheet, with illustrated stopping place for our countries. I always wondered why the co-pilasian man h d to begin the game all over again. I don't think he ever always. Then she would repeat poet y to us—the "Battle of Ivry" or the "Ballads of Scotland"—till my blood used to grow cold and give me shivers of excitement. And then came the time for me to go to bed, and I was glad to go bed, to feel that Thanksgiving was over; that a whole year, w h win er and lessons and hard weather and various small miseries lay before us. But all things come to an end at last—n ot only Thanksgiving, but my story, Polly. Aren't you glad?

Written especially for this paper.

DINAH'S "FANKSGIVIN'."

A Story of the South.

MATTIE O. CAMPBELL.

"Nice appl's, Missus; Yo' want to buy some?"

"Got to-day; I—"

"De berry nices' appl's yo' kan fin', Missus; I nebber s got no sweh appl's 'n dis yeah; dey jes' melt in yo' mouf, an yo' on dat deee tree o' mine. Sell 'em cheap, missus."

"Well I will take a few; just empty them into this basket."

"I nebber lak to do no bezzin, but I 'peared like I gib yo' jes' a few, dis mawn. Yo see my li'l gran'chile, wots bee n alin', he plum sot her heart jackin' dat chicken fo' dinnah a-sarcin' giv'n, an ole Tom jes' a spilein' to please her. She jes de sunshin es chile when she feel good yo' o'ter mind himself, when she gits de mizry in her po' li'l back dey aint no use her try to mek her fo'get dat yo' don't nebber say nothin. Tat, she but hit nigh 'bout broke ole Tom's heart; to see her lay dere a-jerkin' lak, wiv nuf'in to say an' her po' li'l face all drawed out o' shape wiv de pain."

I could see that the old man's thoughts were with her, but he recovered himself and drew his hand across his eyes with a shame-faced expression.

"Yo' here do you jiner, I'n le?"

"Bout a mile t'em yere, missus, down on de line road—jes' de edge on de town."

"Ebbery Fanksgivin' I'm sho to be dere, and wondered how a family could exist in such a tumble-down cabin, especially in the dreary month of June, indeed one of the bleak months to come.

"I think I shall send down for more of the Sweetings in a few days, Uncle," I said, suddenly, as the old man, fearful of philanthropy which a few days often left me a victim to begging tramps, "Can you spare me a few more?"

"Law, yes, missus, dere's mo'on dat tree dan yo fam'ly could use all de fall. Yo kan hab—" (Exit, as I thought, the old man went off with a beam in face.)

Two days before Thanksgiving I remembered my promise.

I stopped the carriage a little way from the old one-story structure, and—asking my young child to hold the horses—I went to the door, and, knocked lightly at the door.

"Yo' in" said a piping voice, and I entered, unbolted the door and entered. A little, thin, colored girl lay on a ruddy cous rucked couch, covered with a soft, shell-pink quilt, and stopped in their work of "picking over" a few raisins and dried currants.

"I came to see about the Sweetings, Ju Uncle Tom at home?"

The thin face lighted up.

"Ole Tom, Missus; but I ben yeh yo' wha' dey is; he done gi' ten orders, ka e he thoughtjo mout come. Ole Missus, we kan bake a chicken, mo' 'an dose frail 'simpin' mout happen dat yo cu ceini come."

"So you are going to have a Thanksgiving dinner" I asked.

"Yes, Missus, ef we don gi' dis'ppoint nowsis. I ax' yo' ef I kan ope' a little our money we b d save up for wood. Kase he cuddent git no job o chop, in. Won't yo' tek a cheer, Missus?"

I did so, and looked about the little room, noting the results of pitiful attempts to make it look like a white people's house." A little shelf which he e i dently been put up by unskilled hands was draped with a white muslin scarf, a poster, the floor was bare e cept for a few old, faithfully-washed scraps of carpet placed here and there, the walls had been festooned with scalloped newspapers which dignified it to the position of a wall paper. The little girl, I thought, was now universally conceded by the medical profession, "as of three kinds—tuberculous, glorified and dyspeptic."

"After 1848, when the Mongolians went to the Sandwich Islands, the disease appeared. Had it been there prior to that time, Lettsom's arles and doctors would have mentioned it. Dr. Hildebrand, who was there as early as 1840 never saw a case of it. I 1866 I went to the Lazaretto and had the privilege of seeing and publishing an account of the terrible suffering of the poor beings confined in those walls of rock. For which I nearly lost my life.

After defining leprosy to be a prehistoric malada, the true cause of which is not fully ksown, but which is defined by some of science to be a pathological product resulting from the sk in, the doctor now proceeds to were treated. "They are often treated as rheumatic patients, some physicians using an anti-syphilitic treatment, which, I believe, is any visible result. Rest is gone, ambition is gone in the preliminary stages of the tuberculoids. Then a small brownish spot is noticed on some region which is most exposed to the air. The skin seems to thicken the pores are dilated, the mucous membrane, the tongue and the voice go, until finally the patient dies in great agony.

"Africa, I believe, is the real home of this disease. I have never seen a negro affected with anesthetic tuberculosis. I have not even seen a case among the Arabs, or in Egypt. Science knows it not, for Homer does not mention it. In Italy and in lower Spain, in Asia, where there was contact with the Africans, leprosy was commonly known.

"In tropical countries, where skin diseases are prevalent, and where the greatest quantity of foods are eaten, there was a supposition that there must be some nourishment for that reason, but I do not think it is so.

"Now, is it curable or not? I have never seen a case of tuberculous leprosy that was susceptible of cure, but anesthetics can be cured. In the Sandwich Islands, I saw a preponderance of the tuberculous form it can not be cured, and they die.

Dr. Bechtinger quoted cases to show its contagious or infectious character. Then he continued: "Is it contagious? Is it the disposition to leprosy in human beings where syphilitic disease has prevailed, and where make such persons susceptible to the disease and should we live in a country where leprosy is known."

The Gordian Knot.

Mrs. Poots (who has been dipping into ancient history): "Poots, why was it, do you suppose, that Alexander the Great wouldn't untie the Gordian knot, Poots?" Poots—"I don't know, mr dear. I've often puzzled over that myself. He was a regular pickle from Gobblegrile, but what on earth he wanted to do with a knotch is more than I can see. Perhaps he wanted to evet it in a knot-half park fence. More's likely that was it."—Texas Siftings.

Mighty Hard to Tell.

First little boy: "Who is that little baby over there on the stoop? Second little boy: "I don't know whether I'm his uncle or his aunt." First little boy: "How do you make out a thing like that?" Second little boy: "Why, the twin brothers married two twin sisters and that belongs to some of them.—Mr. Grundy.

Time Required.

Husband: "It takes you half an hour or more to find your pocket, doesn't it?" Wife (sweetly): "Yes, about that, John, dear, to make you feel in it."—Boston Post.

A CAT WITH A BROOD.

Four Eggs Were Put in Her Favorite Chair and She Hatched Them Out.

John Dugdale, a retired seedsman of Dalston Green, Cumberland, England, is the possessor of a pet hen hatched out four chickens and carefully cared for them, says the New York Sun. The cat is fat and in the motherhood of 5 years old, and has brought up three kittens. Dugdale, as he is fond of open-air sports, has a choice collection of dogs. The cat never received much attention from him, for she was of a somobrest disposition and spent the greater part of the day in the old-fashioned armchair in the kitchen. Mr. Dugdale saw her there one day in the early part of last May. She looked too happy for this world, and in hopes of making her bed more comfortable he placed four eggs between her legs. Old Tabby smelled of them, touched them daintily with her tongue, and then, with her sleepy old eyes half closed, purred contentedly and fell into a meditative doze. She had associated some with the chickens on the place and had doubtless come acquainted with a feeling of envy the hens at their big broods of chickens, which for outnumbered any litter of kittens she could claim.

Tabby slowly raised herself and, after stretching her limbs, rolled the eggs in the center of the cushion and settled down upon them. Mr. Dugdale laughed and walked away, fully believing that the cat would get tired of the eggs in a short time and desert them. But the cat stuck to her nest, cuddled over them and it was clear that unless they were speedily removed they would be cuddled to death. Mr. Dugdale laughed. Mr. Dugdale decided to let the eggs remain, and when three days had passed and Tabby was still intent on hatching them out he became the most interesting of his pets. It was a pride to the cat to see Mr. Dugdale and her an excuse for not stirring about much, and instead her dishes of food and water and drink without the trouble of mieouving. At the end of the first week the work of "setting" was over. Four kittens had been born. Not worm little hollows in the furry sides of Tabby. Mr. Dugdale forgot all about his dogs and horses, and even his love of hunting, for the pleasure of watching his old cat in her unique work absorbed him.

During the rare moments, when Tabby felt it necessary to desert the nest for the purpose of stretching herself and getting something to eat, the owner took care of them. No matter how hungry she was or how far she had to go, she would come at once immediately to prevent any one from disturbing her nest. In the mornings, when the proud cackling of the hens and the distant crow of the rooster were heard, Tabby looked a little troubled, as though she realized that she could never cack e or crow.

The third week of Tabby's work drew to a close with speculation rife as to whether she would hatch out chickens or kittens, or a combination of both, or neither. One morning the old cat suddenly awoke from a sound doze. There were marks of disturbance on her brow. She moved restlessly about and gave a little mewing cry, as if to call her mate but for the caution in the old arm-chair were four little, yellow mites that were stringy, long and very, very thin and very, very hungry.

Tabby purred loudly in her bride and began licking them dry. Her maternal tongue rasped them over and over and they plaintively peeped forth their first cries of hungry life. Then the old cat stopped and with her paws pushed the shells from the chair. The mites were placed in a box in one corner of the kitchen and Tabby went over and lay down by them. She was always alert and when there were strong enough they got into the habit of following her out of the box, and resented this, and, lifting them in her mouth, would bring them back and place them in the box again. Then the cat seemed to realize that the chickens showed their disapproval of indoor life by mewing, and that their little yellow legs during the journey.

The peculiarity of the chickens in going out of doors finally induced Tabby to accompany them. There were three of them, and Tabby never made a mistake in sorting out the four that belonged to her. After afternoon the sun was getting low Tabby would move off slowly in the direction of the kitchen with the little chickens hopping after her. If she chanced to come to any impassable place, she would stop and watch them and showed her superiority to the hen by always being patient with them.

The chickens were more than half-grown when last heard of and were the joy and constant companions of the old cat. Tabby would allow no chickens to come near her pets and would permit no cat to interfere with them.

HORRORS OF LEPROSY.

The Panama Canal Company's Surgeon Gives His Experience.

Dr. Joseph Bechtinger, surgeon of the Panama Canal Company, recently lectured on "Leprosy" in the Academy of Medicine at Philadelphia. Stereopticon views illustrated the interesting lecture, to which about one hundred prominent physicians listened with deep interest.

"Leprosy," said the doctor, after he had described the beautiful tropical scenery in Panama, where the disease is so common, and made plain how the dreaded scourge had never been known there until the importation of a woman from Spain, "is a disease that was now universally conceded by the medical profession, "as of three kinds—tuberculous, glorified and dyspeptic.

"After 1848, when the Mongolians went to the Sandwich Islands, the disease appeared. Had it been there prior to that time Lettsom's arles and doctors would have mentioned it. Dr. Hildebrand, who was there as early as 1840 never saw a case of it. I 1866 I went to the Lazaretto and had the privilege of seeing and publishing an account of the terrible suffering of the poor beings confined in those walls of rock. For which I nearly lost my life.

After defining leprosy to be a prehistoric malada, the true cause of which is not fully ksown, but which is defined by some of science to be a pathological product resulting from the sk in, the doctor now proceeds to

"Now, is it curable or not? I have never seen a case of tuberculous leprosy that was susceptible of cure, but anesthetics can be cured. In the Sandwich Islands, I saw a preponderance of the tuberculous form it can not be cured, and they die.

Dr. Bechtinger quoted cases to show its contagious or infectious character. Then he continued: "Is it contagious? Is it the disposition to leprosy in human beings where syphilitic disease has prevailed, and where make such persons susceptible to the disease and should we live in a country where leprosy is known."

The Gordian Knot.

Mrs. Poots (who has been dipping into ancient history): "Poots, why was it, do you suppose, that Alexander the Great wouldn't untie the Gordian knot, Poots?" Poots—"I don't know, mr dear. I've often puzzled over that myself. He was a regular pickle from Gobblegrile, but what on earth he wanted to do with a knotch is more than I can see. Perhaps he wanted to evet it in a knot-half park fence. More's likely that was it."—Texas Siftings.

Mighty Hard to Tell.

First little boy: "Who is that little baby over there on the stoop? Second little boy: "I don't know whether I'm his uncle or his aunt." First little boy: "How do you make out a thing like that?" Second little boy: "Why, the twin brothers married two twin sisters and that belongs to some of them.—Mr. Grundy.

Time Required.

Husband: "It takes you half an hour or more to find your pocket, doesn't it?" Wife (sweetly): "Yes, about that, John, dear, to make you feel in it."—Boston Post.

Ringing Noises

In the ears, sometimes a roaring, buzzing sound, or snapping like the report of a pistol, are caused by catarrh; that disease, fortunately, is not the common disease. Loss of smell or hearing also results from catarrh. Hood's Sarsaparilla, the great blood purifier, is peculiarly successful in this disease, which it cures by purifying the blood. If you suffer from catarrh, try Hood's Sarsaparilla, and receive assurance of health.

"When I began to take Hood's Sarsaparilla catarrh troubled me less, and now I am entirely cured." JAMES HUNT, Lumberton, Ohio.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Sold by all druggists. $1; six for $5. Prepared only by C. I. HOOD & CO., Apothecaries, Lowell, Mass.

100 Doses One Dollar

"I send Hood's Sarsaparilla for catarrh, and received great relief and benefit from it. The catarrh was at times dangerous, especially in the winter, causing constant discharge from my nostrils, noises in my ears, and pains in the back of my head. The first dose cleared my head in the morning by hawking and spitting was painful. Hood's Sarsaparilla gave me relief immediately, while in time I was entirely cured. I am never without the medicine in my family." Mrs. G. H. GRAY, 329 Eighth street, N. W., Washington, D. C.

Sold by all druggists. $1; six for $5. Prepared only by C. I. HOOD & CO., Apothecaries, Lowell, Mass.

100 Doses One Dollar

CATARRH

Beware of Fraud, as my name and the price are counterfeited by some dealers who hope to sell a worthless imitation. Ask for Ely's Cream Balm and take no other. Before testing the factory, which protect the wrapper, and the name Ely's Cream Balm, with the price, 50 cents, in the box, and the blower, all complete, for 75 cents, at druggists or by mail. Ely's Cream Balm is a specific for Catarrh, and is not a snuff, powder or liquid