If a Friend Has Hurt You.

"I know very well what it is to be disappointed in a friend, writes Anne Mc Cail, in the Woman's Home Companion, but I know, too—because I have made a practice of looking facts in the face—that the bitter resentment and tragic disappointment we feel in such a case are often centered in ourselves our self-esteem has been wounded, or we have been proved mistaken, or we wanted this one friend to devote her self exclusively to us. And it is for some such unworthy thing as this that we are willing to break our hearts. But not if we are in the habit of looking honestly for reasons and causes. Once we learn to do that, how the obbitterness and weakness and failure slip away. Once we know the real cause of a thing that is distressing or unworthy, how much easier is the correction of it!
