Churches, some of which may have been subsidized by government, must of necessity twist the correct teachings of Jesus to meet the needs of cunning men in their control of creatures who have for centuries betrayed, spied upon and killed each other. The largest job of killing commemorates the 1942nd birthday. Happy Christmas to children, service men, and people who think. Fall in State Revenues Seen Next Year, But Can Legislature Cut Expenses?

By GENE ALLEMAN
Michigan Press Association

"Two interesting alternatives face Michigan's new administration:

First, imposition of new state taxes to meet an anticipated fall in state revenues during the next fiscal year starting July 1, 1943.

Second, reduction of state expenditures by legislative and executive curtailment or elimination of "less essential" public services.

Somebody is bound to be hurt.

And, furthermore, political alibis will be hard to conjure. Republicans possess overwhelming control of both houses of the legislature. Only one state elective office—state highway commissioner—remains at the capital today, and the Grand Old Party can't logically pass the buck to him.

* * *

The two alternatives, just presented, are based on the assumption that World War II is going to affect state sales tax collections adversely in 1943 and 1944.

Washington officials, who seem to jump periodically from overoptimism to dire doom, have warned that our 1943 economy will decline to the 1932 low level. And all that despite soaring pay rolls which are flushing the purses of workingmen and women.

Privately, several secretaries of Michigan trade associations are forecasting a definite slump in sales. War industries will hit the hardware, lumber and drugstore business, they concede, when present stocks in many lines of merchandise are exhausted.

* * *

One hopeful sign in the state revenue sky is the memory of world war I when industrial workers insisted on spending money, even for $6 silk shirts.

This philosophy of war-time spending goes something like this:

After a depression drouth when people were frustrated from the pleasure of luxuries and non-essentials, you can't expect wage-earners to resist the temptation in 1943 when pay checks are bigger than ever and Washington insists the war might continue for many years.

Consequently, some wage-earners are going to spend money even if it is for goods or services which they otherwise normally would not demand.

Liquor sales are soaring. Beer taverns and night clubs are crowded. Youth is enjoying another "last fling" Juvenile delinquency is mounting everywhere.

If this pattern of war-time living is going to prevail then actual spending will be maintained regardless of restrictions. The state will get its share in taxes. Do you agree?

* * *

Because elections are often won on the basis of campaign promises, legislators may not relish the prospect of going to Lansing and cutting "non-essential" expenditures to the bone.

And you can't blame them greatly at that.

The two-year term of a Michigan governor doesn't help matters either, for the governor is only human in hoping he may please enough voters to merit reelection in 22 months. Pleasing one voter by offending another is often the price of economy.

It merely emphasizes that economy in government is easier to talk about, and to write about, than to accomplish.

* * *

And the argument continues by pointing out that social security, as we now understand it in the United States, is only a modest beginning of what is to come.

Bismarck introduced social security to Germany as a cure for socialism back in the 1880's. More than a whole century ago Germany established a national system of accident insurance, sickness insurance and old age pensions.

Back in 1908 the British government provided for old age pensions with compulsory deductions from pay of workers and earnings of employers.

In 1911 the British authorized state health insurance on a contributory basis, and followed it up in 1912 with unemployment compulsory for the entire, or almost all the working population. It is estimated that one-third of the housing in England is government-financed.

And all this 20 years before F.D.R.!

The advocates of state socialism either on a basis of being inevitable or desirable, point with satisfaction to a report just submitted to British parliament by Sir William Beveridge.

Among many benefits, the Beveridge plan would create a state system of insurance for the public, offering a variety of policies at low premiums. The state would extend security to the individual from birth to death with maternal to burial payments also on a "pay in advance" basis such as we now have for old age pensions.

As Sir William sees it, here is Atlantic charter. Obviously it has a tremendous propaganda value to the man and woman who are sacrificing heavily to win this war. Whereas the last war was motivated by that paradox of ideas—a war to end war—this conflict would offer the appeal of a war to secure individual freedoms.

* * *

Former President Herbert Hoover, addressing the manufacturers in annual session in New York City recently, called attention to the following change.

In the last war we trained and equipped six million men of whom we transported two million overseas, all of this being accomplished by a Washington bureaucracy numbering 425,000 persons.

In today's war, we have trained around four million men, of whom less than one million are understood to be overseas, while the federal bureaucracy is a veritable the answer to "freedom from want" as proclaimed in the army in itself, more than 2,000,000 persons.

As Hoover sees it, the government is top-heavy. But, of course, many things have happened since 1918.

* * *

Every time a new public service is authorized, whether it be public welfare or unemployment compensation, government assumes a new obligation. More personnel are needed to provide for the new benefits.

This trend has been clearly evident in all recent state administrations, Democratic and Republican.

Now the question arises: Can the 1943-45 state administration in Michigan halt the swing? Will the voters at home favor curtailments in services which have brought new benefits into their lives? Can state aid to local government be reduced?

We don't envy the responsibility of the Michigan state legislators and state officials in wrestling with the problem. It's a tough nut to crack.
