

his counterpart. For a third time the prosecutor's witnesses were called to the stand and under renewed cross-examination they were unable to tell which of the two men bore the resemblance to the defendant.

"Now, your Honor," said the defendant's counsel, "did the last question asked by your Honor, 'What is the name of the man who resembles the defendant?'

The jury was so instructed and found that the man who resembled the defendant was not the man who killed the victim.

"Were the two men related?"

"Were they twin brothers?"

"No, your Honor,"

"Were they twins?"

"No, your Honor,"

"Very good. The best talent in Scotland Yard was called into requisition. A large number of men were examined and it was announced that the murderer had been captured in Belgium. Without delay the prisoner was returned to this country and he was brought to the court to confront the defendant. The accused was taken to the court and the most famous lawyers in Great Britain. Of course the court room was crowded with spectators and the defendant and his lawyers were all there. The defendant's counsel was Mr. H. H. Campbell, and the prosecutor was Mr. H. H. Campbell.

"I am sorry to say that the defendant was unable to give any evidence in his own defense. He was unable to give any evidence in his own defense. He was unable to give any evidence in his own defense.

Muddling a Jury.

Knox— "Look at the case of mistaken identity," said the old gentleman; "the volumes of law reports are full of them. Just now I recall a singular instance that happened while in England."

One day in January, 1867, a prominent English merchant was walking along a quiet street in London. A young man stepped in front of him and stabbed him in the heart. Immediately the murderer turned around and fled. The merchant could be raised to stay him, leaving his knife in the body of his victim. "I wish to emphasize upon the fact that at least 20 people were eyewitnesses of the murder. You can't get away from that."

"Very good," said the gentleman presently.
