The Oakland Realty Co. together with Ernest Petry Jr. and James F. Shore of Detroit have bought the Harrison Hamlin farm and are cutting it into 5 acre farms, three of which are already sold. This is only one of several tracts bought and sold out in small farms and the demand is just starting. "Back to the land" is heard from all quarters and where can you find a finer section than around Birmingham? The Hamlin farm on Maple ave., a state maximized road, within easy walking distance of the car line, makes an ideal home location. The SNOW STORM

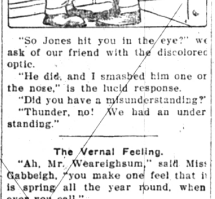
Far down the West a wall of sullen gray
Looms slowly up against the wintry sky;
The shivering trees in terror bend and sway;
One lone dead leaf is caught and swirled on high.
The wind's dull sighing changes to a moan,
The frightened whisper of the naked trees
Throbs gloomily into a monotone
Then changes to a thousand shrieking keys.

Still nearer looms the cloud of sullen gray,
The daylight changes to an ashen hue,
A mystic silence falls upon the day
And then the wind's weird song begins anew.
The people in the street go quickly home,
The children at the windows peer without—
Then like the first fair flakes of flying foam
The snow leaps down and dances round about.

It folds the wailing trees in velvet robes,
It swirls in wondrous drifts along the hill,
It hangs from eaves in white gigantic lobes,
It drapes the overhanging window sill.
Across the valleys charge the wind-blown troops
Of winter, pelting snowflakes through the air—
One hears the chorus of their shrieking whoops
And sees the tattered banners that they bear.
And so the world is conquered; and the night
Comes on while still the trumpets of the wind
Call up the swift battalions all in white
That all the while have waited far behind,
And they pass on; the stars come trembling high
And as celestial snowflakes glint and gleam
Above the silent world that far and nigh
In ivoried stillness holds its peaceful dream.

(Of all sad words that ever have been writ
By punching at the keys, or with a pen
As Whittier once summed it up, to-wit
The saddest words are these: "It might have been.")

MUCH WORSE.



"So Jones hit you in the eye?" we ask of our friend with the discolored optic.

"He did, and I smashed him one or the nose," is the lucid response.

"Did you have a misunderstanding?"

"Thunder, no! We had an under standing."

The Vernal Feeling.

"Ah, Mr. Weareighsum," said Miss Gabbelgh, "you make one feel that it is spring all the year round, when ever you call."

"Now, that's nice," said Mr. Weareighsum, while rich redness of his blush crept athwart his countenance.

"Yes, you do," continued the young lady. "You know that spring always gives us that tired feeling."

A Modern Improvement.

"I dreamed last night that I was in a runaway automobile, lashed to the seat, and my sensations were frightful," said the party who had lunched on lobster salad at midnight.

"Ah, yes," commented the listening friend, "a horseless nightmare!"

Worried About Her.

Our friend the traveler shows signs of being perturbed.

"Has anything gone wrong?" we ask him.

"I am worried about my wife," he tells us.

"Why, you have heard from her every day, haven't you?"

"Yes," he sighs, "but her letters greatly disturb me."

"Is she ill?"

"I fear that something is wrong with her. She has written me three letters lately and has not added a postscript to any of them."

Made a Diagram.

"Yes," said the Party with the Wise Air, "the dairy association that tried to corner the trade was defeated, and is now a wreck."

"Ah," commented the Obviously Humorous Party, "it is now a derelict."

After much argument about the similarity in sound between "derelict" and "dairy licked," the Party with the Wise Air was forced to smile.
