It is the little things in life that count. A couple in New York state lived happily together for two years. A few mornings ago, the husband was on the lawn of the cup and fell into the wife's coffee. The offender was picked up by the husband and recently died upon the lady's pillow. This skeleton of Gaitan was the subject of so much persistent and annoying inquiry that the officials in Washington have found it necessary to issue a circular to the effect that every visitor to the institution has made inquiry to the bones, but the report has been invariably correct. An ordinance was passed by the Rosokov, Va., council some months ago prohibiting certain animals, among them horses, from running at large within the city limits. Mules were omitted—accidentally, it is supposed. The owner of one of the mules, charged with violating the ordinance in question. He pleaded in bar of the offense that mules were not included in the ordinance. The court accepted his plea, and discharged him on the ground that "a mule was not a horse." Since that time the owners of these kicking quadrupeds have not been so anxious to comply with the ordinance, as well as of the defective ordinance. The present executive, however, has just fined one of these parties, deciding that in contemplation of the law "a mule is a horse."

"It is to take a large quantity of quinine, and to take it every day for a week. This will cure the disease, and will keep it from coming back." Stanley says that he has tried this method on his own party, and that it has proved successful. He says that he has also tried it on the natives, and that it has proved successful.
