From A WOMAN'S ANGLE
By MARJORIE ELAINE PORTER

Marjorie E. Porter

This depression, in a way, reminds me of a good old-fashioned cold. One of these disagreeable afflictions that hangs on no matter what you do about it.

And everybody volunteers to tell you how you "caught" it, and is equally sure his remedy is the only certain and unfailing cure. You know how it is. Somebody will say: "Well, of course, the trouble is, you didn't do so-and-so. Do that and tomorrow you will be completely cured."

So it goes with the Depresh. Everybody is discovering a new cause and diagnosing a different theoretical cure.

—O—

And now it's my turn, fellow citizens, to tell you how you "caught" the depression, and to tell you how to get rid of it.

—O—

If you know what I mean, I believe voluntary ignorance is one cause, at least, of the present condition in which the country stands today.

—O—

And by "voluntary ignorance" I mean that the attitude of the great American public for the past five years or more has been that of "what you don't know won't hurt you."

—O—

People have taken the course of least resistance. They didn't want to make an effort to learn anything.

—O—

Responsibility of any sort they regarded as excess baggage and checked it or chucked it wherever and whenever they could.

—O—

When broached on matters of their duty as citizens, in taking a more active interest in political or civic affairs, they shrugged their shoulders and told you to "let George do it."

—O—

They voted for this and that bond issue or expenditure in happy ignorance and gay abandon. And ignorance was bliss as long as the country rode on the crest of a prosperous wave.

—O—

Now when we hear reports and incidents revealing that ignorance, we are appalled. We hardly believe it. And yet we're faced with facts.

—O—

We have only to meditate upon governmental costs and expenditures that have been built up under our very noses while we danced a mad Bacchanale with ignorance and extravagance as playmates.

—O—

And what do you think of this—just as a minor example of civic ignorance. A Denver woman who had testified before a grand jury was troubled by her conscience afterwards, because she did not tell the "whole truth."

—O—

So she confided in a court investigator and asked what the consequence would be. She had been told by jurors who had been suspicious of her testimony, she said, that she would probably have to testify before a petit jury and if she did not tell the truth then, she would go up "for the poor jury."

—O—

And what, she asked the investigator is a "poor jury?"

—O—

It was the deputy district attorney who finally informed her that what she had in mind was "perjury."

—O—

Really, is there any excuse for this in one who possessed the rights of citizenship, or for anyone who had passed the eighth grade?

—O—

It is time to revive our national trait of patriotic zeal. It is time we paid more attention to the ballot, in learning the truth about financial resources of taxpayers before we vote blindly on a great outlay of money for a project which may be backed by questionable political dealings.

—O—

It is time we discarded the cloak of voluntary ignorance, and got down to the business of living and learning for the good of the country.

REPLIES MADE BY ATHERTON

dict the length of time needed for complete recovery as there are so many elements that enter into the situation. Important in this regard would be the extent of voluntary capital expenditures which are bound to take place when confidence finally returns as the result of a definite, continuing and legitimate upward trend in business.

Question: "Would the government be back of this special currency dollar for dollar, as it is with the present currency?"

Answer: S. M. C. would be issued by the United States Treasury in exchange for standard currency, dollar for dollar. The latter would be held at the Treasury to retire S. M. C. when eventually called in. Thus, in value, and as legal tender in its special field, S. M. C. would be exactly the same as standard currency.

Question: "Has not the depression reached too advanced a stage for this plan to be efficacious?"

Answer: Each passing month reveals a further contraction of the nation's income. While it is regrettable that this plan could not have been placed in operation earlier, its efficacy in securing an expansion of business and nullifying income is as certain now as then.

There are only three sources of money for buying goods—current income, capital (savings) and borrowed funds. Voluntary capital expenditures will come only when confidence is restored, and this confidence cannot be created by a temporary increase in business that might result from squandering government funds. Thus we must rely on expenditures from current income, which, after all, is still at least 70 percent of normal from the standpoint of actual buying power.

Question: "Would not the five billion dollar bond issue for public works be as effective as the S. M. C. plan, and with no interference with the individual's income?"

Answer: This is a broad subject and difficult to dispose of briefly. In the author's opinion which is shared by many, this proposal, judged by its probable final results, is but a fearfully expensive and wasteful welfare scheme. From the standpoint of genuine economic recovery it would prove far worse than useless.

The S. M. C. plan would build from the ground up by a safe, scientific utilization of current income and gather momentum with each passing week. A successful demonstration of this plan would quickly result in a normal strengthening of commodity prices and backbones and, hence, encourage voluntary capital expenditures as well.

On the other hand, the largest bond issue so far sponsored would give but poorly-paid temporary employment to a minor portion of the unemployed and fail utterly to induce systematic rational spending by those still receiving adequate incomes.

Finally, when the borrowed money was used up, we still would have our millions of unemployed plus a five billion dollar addition to the public debt plus an added tax item of several hundred million dollars. In other words, five billion dollars "poured down a rat-hole." And nothing "interferes with the individual's income" quite so much as taxes—as we have become grimly aware of late.

WALLED LAKE PROVES POPULAR FOR PICNICS

More than 50 cities within a radius of 100 miles have been represented at picnics held this season at Walled Lake Park, according to the manager, Roy R. Hanson. Church and school groups and Boy and Girl Scout organizations have been the most frequent visitors at the park, Mr. Hanson said. The park will remain open until Sept. 15.
