On roughly-hewn transoms in the center of Ribbon & March's shops in Jersey City, a gentleman replied with peculiar-looking mass of tubing that was explained by the foreman to be the most powerful gun in the world.

The barrel is bolted to eight reservoirs, where the compressed air necessary to fire it is stored. Brass ounces connect the reservoirs to the barrel, and the amount of air necessary to throw out the projectile is regulated automatically.

When the gun is charged the gunner turns the handle of the magazine, which is five feet long, and its two barrels are in a long cone at the head of the projectile.
