

THE WOMAN IN RED.

A Thrilling Italian Story of the Last Century.

BY GEORGE W. H. REYNOLDS.

CHAPTER XXXI.

DONATI, CLAUDIO AND FRANCESCA.

When Count Antonini arrived at his friend's mansion in Naples, and learned that he had been the victim of the attack of the robbers, he was at first incredulous. He knew that his wife had actually left the house. It was a desperate moment, but the end was not far off.

Fortunate! the darkness of the night hid her from the eyes of the robbers. She turned about her in the light as she lay on the bed, and she saw that she was alone.

The cab started furiously, and in the space of five minutes Claudio and his wife were in the hands of the robbers. He was thrown into the river, and he was left to drift down stream.

The current was running outward, and he was soon in the hands of the robbers. He was thrown into the river, and he was left to drift down stream.

The captain of the little schooner was waiting for him. He was thrown into the river, and he was left to drift down stream.

On the third evening after the interview between Francesca and her husband, she was again in the hands of the robbers.

Count Antonini could be seen, this time, in the hands of the robbers. He was thrown into the river, and he was left to drift down stream.

Continued to be absent at the residence of the gentleman returned after three hours subsequently to see him upon business of importance.

The stranger retired, the door was closed, and the three old acquaintances stood before the entrance of the house.

"You are not going to kill me, are you?" asked the man.

"On the contrary my good fellow, I am not going to kill you, but I am going to take you to the hospital."

"What woman is that?" asked the man.

"That is the woman who has been the victim of the attack of the robbers."

"You are not going to kill me, are you?" asked the man.

"On the contrary my good fellow, I am not going to kill you, but I am going to take you to the hospital."

"What woman is that?" asked the man.

"That is the woman who has been the victim of the attack of the robbers."

"You are not going to kill me, are you?" asked the man.

"On the contrary my good fellow, I am not going to kill you, but I am going to take you to the hospital."

"What woman is that?" asked the man.

From the Christian Register. On my arrival at Lehi I was directed, as usual, to the Bishop's house for entertainment. Rapping at the door, I was admitted by a young lady who, I was told, was the daughter of the Bishop.

"Where are you going?" she asked.

"To the Bishop's house," I replied.

"You are not going to kill me, are you?" she asked.

"On the contrary my good fellow, I am not going to kill you, but I am going to take you to the hospital."

"What woman is that?" she asked.

"That is the woman who has been the victim of the attack of the robbers."
