IN THE TROPICS.

A Northern Man in the Abode of Beauty and Indolence.

Correspondence Philadelphia Evening Call.

I sailed from New York January 20 on the Atlas, with the intention of spending a few weeks rusticating on the picturesque island of Jamaica. I will remark here that, the island being a little larger than the State of Connecticut, months instead of weeks might be spent to advantage, and one could still find something new and interesting. Our course lay directly south from New York, and the first land sighted was Watling's island, one of the Bahama group, on January 25. We made the city of Kingston in the Island of Jamaica on the morning of the 27th. Kingston is the largest city on the island, containing 38,000 inhabitants. It is laid out on the Philadelphia plan, with streets at right angles, intersected with lanes just half the width of the streets. A gradual rise of 80 feet to the mile insures good drainage. Like all tropical cities Kingston is built almost wholly of wood, and the streets are lined with beautiful trees—the palm of course predominating. The green mountains overshadow the city and present a grand and picturesque background.

Remained at Kingston a week, with the mercury at 80 deg. in the shade, and having so recently left a zero climate the change was not quite agreeable. Fortunately a more congenial climate was within easy reach. Rising at 6 o'clock on February 3 I indulged in coffee and toast, and then took a carriage for the mountains. There are no steep hills to climb, nothing but a gradual ascent for nine miles to the little village of Gordon Town, situated in a notch in the mountains 1,600 feet above the sea. This is the terminus of all carriage traveling, and from here excellent and easy grade bridle-paths branch out in zig-zag routes to all points of the mountains.

Early next morn ng coffee and toast and off again, with a little black boy for a pilot, with my valise on his head. Most people ride donkey-back from this point, but I preferred to walk. All transportation is confined to donkeys and the heads of the negroes, and it is astonishing to see the enormous loads they (the negroes) will carry with perfect ease. A sight for Northern eyes any morning in Kingston is to see the swarms of men, women and children centering towards the city, bringing fresh fruits and vegetables to market. Many come from a distance of fifteen miles, and if they realize one or two shillings—twenty-five fifty cents—they are satisfied.

Three hours tramping brought me to the summit of Port Royal Mountain, six miles from Gordon Town, and four thousand feet above the sea. Here I found a beautiful little cottage which had been recommended as a boarding house. The landlady, a stout Englishwoman, was very glad to see me, and remarked that I must be very hungry, and then added calmly that she had not an eatable thing in the house—not even a slice of bread. It was a mystery to me how she and her pretty 8-year-old daughter lived—perhaps on air. I was not disposed to be inquisitive, but knew that I could not exist on any such ethereal fare, so I at once wrote an order for a supply of provisions and sent the little black pilot down to Gordon Town. At 1 P. M. the provisions arrived in a large hamper on the boy's head.

This is a beautiful spot, with a day temperature of 70 deg. and at night 60 deg. The view, of course, is magnificent. Kingston lies below, apparently two or three miles distant, but really fifteen miles by the shortest path. Where any soil exists the mountains are cultivated from base to summit, while little thatched cottages are everywhere visible. A few miles north is Blue Mountain peak. It is the highest on the island, 7,360 feet, about 1,000 feet higher than Mt. Washington, New Hampshire. There is a bridal path to the summit.

A little to the left on Port Royal Mount is a cinchona plantation, carried on by the Government of Jamaica. Like most Government undertakings it does not pay, and they are trying to induce private capital to invest in the enterprise. The population of Jamaica in 1881 was 581,000, an increase of 75,000 in ten years. The proportions to each 100 persons are two coolies, three whites, twenty mulattoes and seventy-five blacks. Wages are very low, and the blacks will not work unless compelled to by starvation. For health, recreation, climate and scenery this island is unsurpassed, but trade and labor are at a standstill.

Strange and Romantic History.

New York World.

On June 23, 1849, Capt. Poulett, nephew and heir presumptive of the earl of Poulett, fell in love with Elizabeth Newman of Portsea, England, a young girl of stainless reputation and respectable, though not aristocratic parentage, the attachment eventually resulting in their marriage. Naturally young Poulett's proud relatives did not look with favor upon this mingling of the blue blood of the ancient Poulletts with the comparatively plebeian blood of the Newmans, and he was given the cold shoulder by all. But the captain was stubbornly indifferent, happy in the possession of a good and beautiful wife. Eventually a son was born to the happy couple and was christened William Tournon Thomas Poulett. But it was written that a change should come over the young wife's dream of happiness, and, as time wore on, Viscount Hinton's affection for his pretty helpmate began to cool and, pleading his uncle's displeasure and their future prospects at stake, he reasonably begged her to agree to a separation, and after many tearful scenes, tears and entreaties, during which Elizabeth's gentle heart was gradually breaking, the separation was agreed upon and the discarded countess retired to pine downward to the grave, receiving a small annuity to support her. Before her death Viscount Hinton, who had succeeded his uncle to the titles and estates June 20, 1866, was entreated by his brokenhearted wife to take their child and allow him to hold the rank which was his by all sacred and legal rights; but the earl of Poulett was not the "Capt. Poulett" who had loved her well enough to brave the scorn of the world of society in which he moved. Thus her appeals were treated with lofty neglect. The son did not inherit the meek spirit of his mother. He became wild and restless, spent his money in frivolity and finally became a clown at the Burton theatre. It is now rumored that other claimants to the title of Viscount Hinton have appeared upon the scene to dispute the identity of Elizabeth's wild son. The heir of Poulett, Elizabeth Newman's husband, is said to have had a mistress, whom he married after the death of his wife, and by whom he had a son, the result being that "aristocratic England" is likely to be treated to a long and wearisome trial, for Elizabeth's son is determined to assert his rights to the title and estates of the earls of Poulett.
