BOYCOTTING.

There Are Two Kinds—The Direct, and the Indirect.

The Former, Tolerated by Society—The Latter, Unknown to the Law.

Most persons who mix much with other people have sometimes found a disposition to regard the process commonly known as "boycotting" as a powerful but legitimate engine of organized labor. The social analogies which are cited in support of its legitimacy are familiar to every one. It is an open secret that many of our sects habitually boycott tradesmen who are not of their creed. The boycotting of one class of society by another or by all others is about as old as the organization of society into classes. However un-Christian or immoral these cases of boycotting may, in the abstract, become, it is practically impossible to frame a sufficient indictment against them, to specify any workable method by which organized society can get a hold upon them and put a stop to them. It is therefore argued, and often very plausibly argued, that boycotting, since it is a thing which society cannot reach, is a thing to which society must yield; that he who is industrially dull to the argument against boycotting is under no further or legal obligations to refrain from using it to any extent.

That the analogies indicated may not carry a force to which they are not fairly entitled, it may be well to distinguish carefully between the two different kinds of boycotting, for which the names direct and indirect boycotting might be employed. The former, direct boycotting, consists in the exercise of the boycotter of his right of choice of the persons, firms or corporations with whom he will deal, by placing means to induce him to choose one and reject others may be unfounded, or even indirectly immoral; but the exercise of the right of choice is an act with which society would find it hard to interfere without the implication of almost intolerable evils. Indirect boycotting consists in the exercise of this variety of boycotting alone. The latter, for which the name of indirect boycotting is suggested, consists in the effort of the boycotter to prevent other people from exercising their right of choice of persons, firms, or corporations with whom they shall deal.

When a labor or other organization decides not to purchase a particular kind of stoves, it is exercising its right of choice between makers; and whether the antecedent reasons be good or bad, society can hardly reach the overt act of direct boycotting. When a labor or other organization goes further, and threatens or attempts to boycott all who sell or buy the stoves in question, it denies to third parties the very right of choice on which it insists for itself. If society cannot reach and suppress this form of indirect boycotting, then the neutral third parties are denied the equal protection of the laws; and class government, in its most odious form, takes the place of the equal rights on which our system of society has been based.

As soon as the distinction is clearly apprehended, it must be evident that every precedent which has been offered in defense of the new system of boycotting, even the most ancient and eighteen months, is altogether irrelevant. The precedents offered are all cases of direct boycotting, which society has tolerated, not because it approved them, because it would have cost more to suppress them than the suppression would have been worth. The system which it is sought to establish on these precedents is a quite different one, one which society cannot tolerate without surrendering its own reason for existence.

To establish the proposition that society and government must suppress the new form of boycotting, or abandon the functions of society as we have known them, it is only necessary to consider the essential nature of indirect boycotting. In the first place, its nature is to spread. Let the case be that a newspaper is boycotted. Under the old system, the results are limited; certain persons no longer buy the newspaper or advertise in it, and that is all. Under the new system, it becomes necessary to boycott all the news-stands which deal in the newspapers; then all those who patronize such hotels, or who deal with their lodgers; and so on ad infinitum. Once grant the principle of the indirect boycott, and no limitation is possible except the number of the boycotters. Any social struggle, once begun, must be more or less general.

In the second place, there is no longer any neutrality possible for uninterested or peaceably disposed third classes. They must take part with the boycotted, by dealing with him, or with the boycotters, by refusing to deal with the boycotted. The boycotter thus becomes the intestine enemy of society and its peace. The closest analogy is the case of the first Napoleon in the international society of Europe during the early years of this century. His consistent policy was that of the indirect boycott. If he could not reach England, he held every people an enemy unless it took part with him against England. In the end, the organized international society of Europe was really compelled to boycott him. The analogy will be complete in our case when capital organizes and makes use of the indirect boycott as organized labor is doing. The lot of the uninterested individual citizen will then be an unenviable one.

In the third place, the organization which succeeds in maintaining this right of indirect boycotting must necessarily grow enormous by simple accretion. A small class can make even an indirect boycott cover but a small territory. It is naturally impelled to join a larger organization, through which it can reach a wider jurisdiction. This impulse is universal; and the sudden and startling increase of the Knights of Labor organization is the result. The larger it grows, the stronger is the impelling force to join it. The greater also is its power over the social organism; and it tends to become a power within the state greater than the state itself. If this were all, it might be worth while to consider the question, whether it would not be better that the Knights of Labor should assume the responsibilities as well as the powers of government, and make other classes contented subjects, as they can no longer be equal American citizens.

But the case cannot stop here. The organization which now wields the great power of indirect boycott is unknown to the law. There is nothing to give it a monopoly of the power, or to prevent new and ambitious men from forming rather organizations in competition with it. Not a month of the year 1886 has passed without an attempt to form such a rival organization; and the time must come when the attempt must be successful. The new organization, however "subsidiary" or friendly at first to the labor organization, must come into collision with it at last. Even a total surrender to the indirect boycott would not save society from the effects of it at the hands of rival labor organizations. The war is one in which neutrality is impossible, and even surrender is useless.

The indirect boycott, then, is a private wrong; in that it strikes at the right of private security, which the state is bound to maintain for the individual citizen. Its plainest aspect is when it is threatened or employed for the purpose of extorting money, under the guise of fines or otherwise. The act is a conspiracy which law would not tolerate in any person not a representative of a labor organization. Other individuals are not allowed to collect their debts or to enforce their contracts in that fashion. It is also a public wrong, for it strikes at the functions and existence of the state itself. The most plainest aspects of this point are in two recent propositions. One is the proposed organization of the policemen of our cities into branches of the Knights of Labor. The guardians of the public peace would then owe allegiance not to the state, but to the imperium in imperio. The other is the proposed boycotting of the militia of a State, of individuals who do not leave the militia organizations, and of individuals who refuse to boycott members of the militia. This rises beyond conspiracy into the field of treason. But it is the logical result of an admission of the principle of indirect boycotting.

The inevitable tendency to social disintegration is already shown by the increasing disposition to make use of the boycott as a remedy for the real or imaginary grievances of all sorts of combinations and classes of individuals. The tendency is increased by the practical license which the organization of the Knights of Labor allows to its branches. If a branch of the order makes use of the boycott, in the shape of a causeless strike against the unmarried third party or otherwise, the boycott continues until it is removed by the branch which applied it, or until the boycotted party accepts the mediation of the managing committee of the whole order. The order is a federation whose principle is a range of local sovereignty. In these local boycotts, the branches are thus the "wicked partners," who take the responsibility of the act; the managing committee is the factor whose "moderation recommends the system to those who do not perceive its real nature. Let us understand the thing clearly, its nature, and its results. The new system, in any of its forms of combination to injure the business or assail the rights of uninterested third parties, is one which the state must deal with or suffer itself to be dissolved. The exercise of the function of the individual would be merely a relegation of that function to new combinations of the associated individuals. By making the alternative one of social scare or social warfare, labor succeeds only in forcing public consideration of a question before which even its claims to recognition and substantial justice must retire for the time.

The single question which is presented upon the American people is whether they will permit a power to be exercised by one class of American citizens which must deprive other classes of their rights, or compel them to organize similarly in self-defense and overthrow social order in the inevitable conflict. The only admissible answer to the question would seem to be the decision of the state to adhere to its fundamental principle, to deal with individuals only, and to resist combinations whose object is to usurp or to nullify the state's functions of punishing or protecting the individual citizen.—The Century Magazine.

Mr. Gladstone.

Teachableness is the trait of Mr. Gladstone's mind which most strongly attracts his friends who have followed him in his noble career. Men whether young or old prove their intelligence, not by what they know, for the wisest man knows little, but by what they are capable of learning and unlearning. Most of us having received opinions from our parents, or from our peculiar education, adhere to them, not with honesty merely, but with obstinacy and pride.

Mr. Gladstone's has been a growing and a rising mind from youth to hoary age. His father, Sir John, a Liverpool merchant, was a most fixed and devoted Tory, a slave owner, a conspicuous and enthusiastic supporter of Tory Governments. He was a Scotchman, too, both by birth and lineage, and the Scotch are slow and hard to change. There is no Tory quite so set as a Scotch Tory.

From such a father, the future statesman went up to the University of Oxford, which invests Tory principles with the charm of venerable and romantic antiquity. What a beautiful Tory it is! How easy to forget in its peaceful gardens and secluded walks, in the shadow of its ancient and ivycled colleges, along the verdant shores of the silvery Isis—how easy to forget the ugly struggles of the poor for life, of the oppressed for liberty! How easy to forget the common lot of humanity.

Then he went to parliament, not by the choice of a free constituency, but by the simple mandate of a powerful Duke. On this new scene, exactly a filial duty, he had to half apologize for his father's possession of slaves. He accepted the Tory and high church system in all its extent supported every measure of his party, and wrote a high church book.

But his mind was, happily, capable of change—the change that comes of growth, of increase of knowledge, of sympathy with man and with the movement of the time. He was teachable. He was open to conviction.

The Irish Famine taught him; Richard Cobden's eager reasoning taught him; the cruelty of Italian kings taught him; and he slowly learned to put more trust in the people, and less in the hereditary rulers. Liberty regulated by just laws; government by the wh le people; universal education; the least restraint of inclination consistent with order and right; and last but not least, the fear of God, and the desire to meet Him approval; these became his maximums of policy.

The strangest thing of all is, that he retains this remarkable capacity of growth and self-correction to the great age of seventy-six, when even the extremest radical is apt to grow timid and conservative.—Youth's Companion.

Anxious for His Young Friend.

"Daniel," remarked the president, contemplatively, as he smoked his morning cigar and blew the ring out into the future.

"Yes, sire," answered the constant secretary.

"Does your wife get up very early to go to market?"

"Not very early, sir—for her."

"Does she have to build the fire, Daniel?"

"Only the kitchen fire, in summer, sire."

"Does she cook three meals a day, Daniel?"

"No; two and a half—breakfast, dinner and lunch."

"And is she quite happy, Daniel?"

"Extravagantly so, sire. Why do you ask?"

"Because, Daniel, a young lady friend of mine is contemplating matrimony, and, having had no experience in that line myself, I earnestly know how to advise her. It is for this, Daniel, I question you; for heaven knows I do not desire to have the dear child bring unhappiness upon herself, if I can prevent it."—Washington Critic.

Back to Life

A most remarkable case of suspended animation has just been brought to light in Toledo. The story is that two years ago Hugh McIntyre, a young Irishman living in Detroit, married a daughter of Mrs. Cunningham, who resides in Toledo. A few days ago he died, and his remains were placed temporarily in a vault at Detroit.

Eight days after his death an uncle visited the vault with the intention of removing the body to the cemetery, and was horrified to see the young man sitting up in his coffin, with the grave broken. Young McIntyre was very weak and pale. His hands was lacerated and bleeding, but he was still alive. He was taken at once to Toledo. His wife was terribly frightened, but was delighted to see him after having mourned for him as dead.
