OLD ZACHARY.

The Twelfth President to Have a Monument.

A Washington correspondent of The Atlanta Constitution writes: It seems probable that the bill providing for the erection of an equestrian statue of Gen. Zachary Taylor, twelfth president of the United States, will pass during the present session. At all events it has had the start and advantage of a favorable recommendation from the joint committee of both houses of congress on the library.

The monument business has been somewhat overdone, and Mr. O'Neill, of Pennsylvania, is authority for the statement, as a member of the joint committee, that the monument to "the hero of Buena Vista" will be the last to be recommended at the present session. The sentiment in favor of an enduring tribute to 'Old Zach" overcame even Senator Hoar, who had intimated that he meant to do all in his power to call a halt on the matter of monuments, and in the committee he joined Senator Voorhees and others in favor of the proposed monument to President Taylor.

Gen. Floyd King, of Louisiana, a Georgian by birth, and a son of Thomas Butler King, is an enthusiastic patron of this bill. His father, along with Mr. Stephens and Gen. Toombs, advocated Taylor's nomination instead of Clay as the whig candidate in 1848. Taylor's nomination was, in fact, a Georgian movement. Mr. Stephens had more than any other man to do with it. Gen. Toombs and Mr. King went heart and soul into the movement. They were actively assisted by Abraham Lincoln, then a whig member from Illinois. The bold conception of throwing aside the idol of the whig party and putting the old soldier to the front was worked out mainly by five or six of the younger leaders of the party in the house, among whom Stephens and Lincoln were especially active. The nomination of Gen. Taylor and his success after a campaign which these young leaders pushed with great vigor, gave them, of course, powerful influence with the inpipient administration. During the brief period from Taylor's inauguration to his death the Georgia trio, Stephens, Toombs and King, were among the most trusted of the counselors of the president.

President Taylor attended the ceremonies at the laying of the corner-stone of the Washington monument, and on that occasion, by exposure to the weather, contracted the illness which terminated his career. He died just as his administration was shaping its policy. A few years ago Mr. Stephens, in a newspaper controversy with Thurlow Weed, threw much light upon the aim, and purposes of President Talyor, which no man understood better than the Georgia statesman. About the beginning of Taylor's administration Georgia's influence in national politics probably touched its highest point.

Howell Cobb became speaker of the house of representatives. He left congress to be elected governor of Georgia on the issue of the compromise measure of Henry Clay. On the same issue Mr. Toombs became senator and Mr. Stephens loomed up as a candidate for the presidency. Stephen A. Douglas, in his speech delivered at Atlanta in 1860, divulged the plan which had been cherished by the young whigs of nominating Mr. Stephens for president. George W. Crawford, of Georgia, was secretary of war, under both Taylor and Fillmore. The close connection of Georgia with the Taylor administration naturally awakens an interest among Georgians in the proposed monument. Gen. Marcus Wright, of Tennessee, says that his state is in favor of the tribute to the soldier president. Kentucky had too many gallant sons under the old man in Mexico to feel indifferent to his monument. Harrison and Logan, of Illinois, were both with Taylor in Mexico. Of Georgians, now of national repute, Senator Colquitt is the only one who served in the Mexican war.

Mr. Theodore Mills, son of the late Clark Mills, has the only cast of Gen. Taylor that has been preserved, and he will probably be selected as the artist of the statue.

Gen. Floyd King is an eminently proper patron of the bill to erect this memorial. His father was one of Gen. Taylor's closest and most valued friends. Gen. King is a native of Georgia, a state to which Gen. Taylor owed his nomination, and he represents in congress a Louisiana, the state which gave Taylor to the country as its twelfth president.

A Well-Read Man.

Let a man be steeped not only in Shakespeare but in literature generally, yet, if he be ignorant of Milton, or, failing Milton, of Homer, Æschylus or Dante, he is, beyond doubt, an ill-read man. He, therefore, it seems fair to contend, who draws from these two fountains the main supply of his intellectual enjoyment, may, so far as other springs are concerned, go where he pleases. He need not trouble himself about what he ought to have read, but may just read what he pleases. None has any right to lightly esteem his literary taste because he has not read this or that author. When such pronouncia of genius as those in which he delights lie before him, it is perfectly excusable if he leaves lesser works alone. To the blue-stocking who asks him whether he does not adore Swinburne, he may with no sense of inferiority reply: "Madam, I have never read a line of his poetry—but come and read with me this magnificent passage from 'Paradise Lost.'" To his cynical friend, who admires the bitterness of Pope's "Satires," and is astonished at his ignorence of them, he may make answer: "Keep your Pope to yourself; I am reading 'Othello'—there is bitterness enough there!" While, therefore, it would, of course, be foolish to claim any merit for a man who should confine himself exclusively to Shakespeare and Milton (though some not unknown men have been "men of one book") and that book not always such a great one as the book of Milton or the book of Shakespeare; as, for example, Sir William Jones, who "invariably read through, every year, the works of Cicero"), it seems safe to maintain that with them for a foundation he may build any super-structure he pleases. And with such a foundation he is, in the best sense of the term, a well-read man.—Temple Bar.

Wood-pulp for the manufacture of paper is now made from the wood of the spruce and poplar. When the first paper was made from wood-pulp it was thought that poplar was the best, and perhaps the only wood which could be used, but during the last few years it has been found that spruce wood made better and stronger pulp that poplar.
