City Advises Arranging Now For Tree Spray

Now's the time to contract for spraying of elm trees on private property, Birmingham forestry and parks superintendent Charles W. Gale advised residents this week.

Gale said the DDT spray protection against Dutch elm disease should be applied anytime before the trees leaf out, which is usually about the first week in May. He recommended that property owners call a tree service firm as soon as possible for the spring spraying, to avoid a last minute rush. Residents should specifically request the special Dutch elm disease control spray, he said. The city lost only seven trees to the disease last year, while 48 were lost on private property, Gale said, indicating some private owners have neglected spraying.

* * *

GALE ADDED that "the second spray, formerly recommended for later in the summer, is now known to be of very little value in areas where an effective control program is underway."

He said elimination of the second spraying will avoid harm to birds.

He added that DDT residues stick to trees longer than was originally thought, and few tree infections take place late in summer.

The Birmingham forestry and parks department would be glad to answer inquiries about the spraying problem, Gale said.

Sweden's defense industries, now largely located in under-ground sites for protection against possible attack, find their location paying off in peacetime. Controlled humidity is said to protect tools and the filtered, cleaned air is said to cut down on employes' illness incidence.
