Commemorate Civil War Centennial Wednesday

By BILL NEWMAN
Member of the Civil War Centennial Commission

Probably the best-known fact about the Civil War, even to most high school history students, is that it began officially with the bombardment of Fort Sumter, in South Carolina.

Next Wednesday, April 12, we will commemorate the 100th anniversary of the sudden and violent eruption of a war which had culminated nearly a generation of wrangling between North and South over states' rights, slavery and tariffs. Fort Sumter was the point of no return; before it, the chance for 11th hour compromise always existed; afterward, war was the only answer.

Event leading up to the bitterest war in our history moved swiftly following Lincoln's election in November, 1860. Seven Southern states, South Carolina first, had seceded from the Union and declared themselves "independent and sovereign states."

HASTILY ORGANIZED militia in these states went about seizing forts, arsenals and government buildings within their boundries. By March, U.S. military forces were left only three points in all the seceded states. One of these was Fort Sumter, blocking the harbor of Charleston.

BIRMINGHAM CIVIL WAR CENTENNIAL COMMISSION

There a handful of Union soldiers worked long hours bolstering the fort's defenses, trying hard not to notice the scores of guns the South Carolina troops were positioning around them.

Everyone knew there could be only one result; Lincoln had refused to surrender the fort and the Union troops knew it would be relieved. At 4:30 a.m. on April 12 Confederate General Beuregard's guns commenced firing and the last old-fashioned (and the first modern one) began.

THE BOMBARDMENT lasted for 34 hours; the Union gunners put a good fight but the outcome was fore-ordained. The Union commander, Major Anderson, was crumpling, most of his guns out of action, and his men suffering from the 19th Century equivalent of a shellshock, surrendered.

As a battle Fort Sumter didn't amount to much; the only man killed was a Union soldier killed when a gun exploded after the surrender. But what the engagement lacked in casualties and brilliant tactics, it made up for more than made up in significance.

All the years and all the work spent seeking a solution to the nation's deep sectional crisis, generation of statemen and politicians dedicated to finding a solution was swept away overnight and a generation of soldiers was raised. The solution now was a war which would cost a half-million of our men's lives and leave half the nation in ruins.

ON APRIL 15 Lincoln declared the state of rebellion existed and called for 75,000 three-month volunteers. The call went into the farthest reaches of the North and was answered three times over by citizens angered by the indignity to the flag.

Among the first volunteers from our area was Israel B. Richardson, a Pontiac businessman and a West Point graduate who had left the army in 1850. On April 25, just two weeks after Sumter, Richardson was appointed colonel in command of the Second Michigan Infantry.

The regiment was mustered at Fort Wayne and arrived in Virginia the following June. Following the battles of First Manassas and the Peninsular campaign, Richardson rose rapidly to the rank of Major General, a rare opportunity of being able to lead men without being pompous and vain as many of his contemporaries were.

HE HAD A great deal of initiative in battle during a time when Union officers seemed unable to make decisions quickly.

Richardson seemed headed for important command duties when he was mortally wounded at the battle of Antietam Creek, Sept. 17, 1862. His body was brought back to Michigan where it lay in an unmarked grave for some years.

A year after the end of the war, his grave was marked appropriately. The marker still stands in Pontiac's Oak Hill cemetery.
