Cygnus the Swan Lights June Sky

June is a good month to watch the Swan.

This constellation, rising in the northeastern sky, contains the Northern Cross.

"The Swan's wings are spread wide, his neck is stretched out, and his feet, formed by fainter stars, are trailing behind as he flies along the Milky Way," says University of Michigan astronomer Hazel M. Losh.

The brightest star in the Swan, or Cygnus, is bluish-white Deneb in the tail Deneb also marks the head of the Cross.

"VARIOUS LEGENDS account for the Swan," Professor Losh notes. "Some suppose that it represents Orpheus, who was changed at his death into a swan, and placed near his magic harp (Lyra) in the sky."

Not far from Deneb is 61 Cygni, the first star to have its distance measured in 1837. At the head of the Swan is Albireo, one of the most beautiful colored double stars (one blue and one gold) in the whole heavens, Professor Losh says.

Rising near the east point and not far from the Swan is Aquila or the Eagle. "One can scarcely mistake Altair, the bright star of Aquila, for it has two attendant stars, one above and one below it, and the three stars in line form a striking group, known as 'the family of Aquila'."

The oldest known version of the Cinderella story dates back to the ninth century in China, but the literature of almost every nation on earth contains some variation on the rags-to-riches Cinderella theme. The version known best today is that written by Charles Perrault and published in France around 1697. Perrault borrowed the story from local folklore, but added many new embellishments. Among the French writer's contributions were the pumpkin that turns into a coach and the mice that are transformed into horses. Perrault was also the first to include the lost slipper that helped the prince to find his heroine. In the Perrault story, the slipper was made of fur, but the English translator confused "vair," the French word for fur, with "verre," the French word for glass, and this is why today's Cinderella wears a glass slipper instead of a fur one.
