

Heiress Hunting

"I would not do that, Mr. Fenley, said Etie, who had by this time recovered her self-composition completely. "I am not a dressmaking girl, but I can sew, and I can collect the money that my friend has earned."

"Struck by some account of her tone, he looked at her with a keen interest. He had seen her at the dinner, and he had seen her at the ball, but he had never seen her so close as she was now."

"Thank you," with a regal intonation on her head. "Good evening." "But you will let me accompany you to the ball, will you?"

"I shall do nothing of the sort," she resolutely replied, as she deposited the bill safely in her little silver portfolio. "I have no time to spare."

"I have no time to spare," Fenley, to waste no more of your valuable time and powerful intellect in the least satisfactory business of "heiress-hunting," said he.

"That was the last that he ever saw of Henrietta Hall."

"Place Your Hand in Mine, Will You?" "I have a little more to say, my dear Etie. I have a little more to say to you."

YOUNG FOLKS CORNER.

"I am not a dressmaking girl, but I can sew, and I can collect the money that my friend has earned."

"Struck by some account of her tone, he looked at her with a keen interest. He had seen her at the dinner, and he had seen her at the ball, but he had never seen her so close as she was now."

"Thank you," with a regal intonation on her head. "Good evening." "But you will let me accompany you to the ball, will you?"

"I shall do nothing of the sort," she resolutely replied, as she deposited the bill safely in her little silver portfolio. "I have no time to spare."

"I have no time to spare," Fenley, to waste no more of your valuable time and powerful intellect in the least satisfactory business of "heiress-hunting," said he.

"That was the last that he ever saw of Henrietta Hall."

"Place Your Hand in Mine, Will You?" "I have a little more to say, my dear Etie. I have a little more to say to you."

DOMESTIC HINTS.

"I am not a dressmaking girl, but I can sew, and I can collect the money that my friend has earned."

"Struck by some account of her tone, he looked at her with a keen interest. He had seen her at the dinner, and he had seen her at the ball, but he had never seen her so close as she was now."

"Thank you," with a regal intonation on her head. "Good evening." "But you will let me accompany you to the ball, will you?"

"I shall do nothing of the sort," she resolutely replied, as she deposited the bill safely in her little silver portfolio. "I have no time to spare."

"I have no time to spare," Fenley, to waste no more of your valuable time and powerful intellect in the least satisfactory business of "heiress-hunting," said he.

"That was the last that he ever saw of Henrietta Hall."

"Place Your Hand in Mine, Will You?" "I have a little more to say, my dear Etie. I have a little more to say to you."

THE BRUSHER KING.

"I am not a dressmaking girl, but I can sew, and I can collect the money that my friend has earned."

"Struck by some account of her tone, he looked at her with a keen interest. He had seen her at the dinner, and he had seen her at the ball, but he had never seen her so close as she was now."

"Thank you," with a regal intonation on her head. "Good evening." "But you will let me accompany you to the ball, will you?"

"I shall do nothing of the sort," she resolutely replied, as she deposited the bill safely in her little silver portfolio. "I have no time to spare."

"I have no time to spare," Fenley, to waste no more of your valuable time and powerful intellect in the least satisfactory business of "heiress-hunting," said he.

"That was the last that he ever saw of Henrietta Hall."

"Place Your Hand in Mine, Will You?" "I have a little more to say, my dear Etie. I have a little more to say to you."

HOOD'S DISCOVERY.

"I am not a dressmaking girl, but I can sew, and I can collect the money that my friend has earned."

"Struck by some account of her tone, he looked at her with a keen interest. He had seen her at the dinner, and he had seen her at the ball, but he had never seen her so close as she was now."

"Thank you," with a regal intonation on her head. "Good evening." "But you will let me accompany you to the ball, will you?"

"I shall do nothing of the sort," she resolutely replied, as she deposited the bill safely in her little silver portfolio. "I have no time to spare."

"I have no time to spare," Fenley, to waste no more of your valuable time and powerful intellect in the least satisfactory business of "heiress-hunting," said he.

"That was the last that he ever saw of Henrietta Hall."

"Place Your Hand in Mine, Will You?" "I have a little more to say, my dear Etie. I have a little more to say to you."

MARVELOUS DISCOVERY.

"I am not a dressmaking girl, but I can sew, and I can collect the money that my friend has earned."

"Struck by some account of her tone, he looked at her with a keen interest. He had seen her at the dinner, and he had seen her at the ball, but he had never seen her so close as she was now."

"Thank you," with a regal intonation on her head. "Good evening." "But you will let me accompany you to the ball, will you?"

"I shall do nothing of the sort," she resolutely replied, as she deposited the bill safely in her little silver portfolio. "I have no time to spare."

"I have no time to spare," Fenley, to waste no more of your valuable time and powerful intellect in the least satisfactory business of "heiress-hunting," said he.

"That was the last that he ever saw of Henrietta Hall."

"Place Your Hand in Mine, Will You?" "I have a little more to say, my dear Etie. I have a little more to say to you."