SHE WAS A LADY.

A Colored Woman Who Wouldn't Nurse Colored People.

"I'm a lady!" The speaker, says the Jacksonville (Fla.) Times-Union, was not Mrs. Grady who, according to the song, was so fond of parading her lineage and accomplishments, but a big, buxom black woman, who had come over from New Orleans among those bewilded as of the "Trained Red Cross" persuasion. She stood in the reception-room of the Sanny Hills hospital and her defiant words were addressed to Dr. Sollace Mitchell, the physician in charge. In assigning the new nurses to their duties Dr. Mitchell, when he came to the colored Red Cross female, very naturally had assigned her to the charge of the colored ward.

This was too much for big Emily. She drew herself up to her full height, tossed her head back haughtily, and blazed through her white teeth: "Me take charge of the colored ward! Not much! I'm one of the leading ladies of New Orleans and I didn't come here to nurse niggers! I'm a lady, I am."

"Emily," said the doctor, as he had adopted this familiar fashion of addressing his nurses, "I consider myself a gentleman, but not too good to attend the sick among the colored people and do what I can to alleviate their sufferings. You may be a lady, but your refusal to nurse the sick of your own race casts a slight shadow on the title. Now I'll give you ten minutes to decide between taking charge of that colored ward and going back to New Orleans"—and the doctor pulled out his watch.

Emily tried to swallow her pride but it wouldn't go down, so she said she would go back to New Orleans among "decent white folks." She was driven to the station, but as she had been in an infected city, she was effectually quarantined from going out of it. So she has been sent to Camp Perry for ten days, where, among the campers of her own color, she can study the race question at leisure.

Character in Handwriting.

There are people who claim to read men's characters from their writing. As the writing of every nation is distinguished by certain strong peculiarities, it is easy for an expert to decide to what nation a writer belongs. Having settled that, certain large characteristics which are common to all men, but in different degrees, can be seen in every handwriting. A certain number of men are calm, even-lived, sensible and practical. Men of that class are almost certain to write plain, round hands in which every letter is distinct by itself; neither very much slanted forward, nor tilted backward; no letter very much bigger than its neighbor, nor with heads much above or tails much below the letters not so distinguished; the letters all having the same general neighbiness, and the lines true to the edges of the paper, neither tending upward nor downward. Exact, business-like people will have an exact handwriting. Fantastic minds revel in quirks and streamers, and sometimes for the capital letters, and this quality is not infrequent in certain business hands, as if the writers found a relief from the prosaic nature of their work, in a chance for ideas to retain letters. Firm, decided downright men are not to bear on the pen while writing and to make their strokes hard and thick. On the contrary, people who are not sure of themselves, and are lacking self-control, prove nervenly, and with anxious looking, scarcely hands. Ambitious people are apt to be overworked; they are always in haste, and either forget to cross their t's or to dot their i's. They are also apt to run the head few letters of every word into an illegible scrawl. Flurried, troubled and conscience-twinged persons have a crabbed and uneven handwriting.—Scribd, Nicholas.

Munificent Gifts to a College.

A few years ago a well-dressed, fine-looking stranger called on Prof. Packard of Bowdoin college and asked permission to look over the college buildings. The professor very courteously showed him all about the institution and when the stranger went away he left his card, on which was the name Henry Winkler. A short time afterward the college received Mr. Winkler's check for $60,000 with which to found a professorship of Latin, and now soon his death the college receives $30,000 more.
