THE YOUNG SPILKIN'S DAUGHTER.

She lay there with the sharpness of remorse, in the exhaustion of a suffering she scarcely had strength to bear. When the soldier had gone and Gretchen stole softly to her side with the tidings of her ill success, she lay on her narrow bed, while her eyes wandered and still as death.

For the morning look, she was in the clutches of a terrible fever.

Days passed on. In fear and trembling the good woman and her daughter nursed the girl. Medical aid they dared not summon for fear of disclosure. They did not know how to cure her, and she lay unconscious of every effort and simple means as they knew of. She lay unconscious of every effort and simple means as they knew of. She lay unconscious of every effort and simple means as they knew of.
