WAVERLAND.

A Tale of Our Coming Landlords.

CHAPTER XI. CONTINUED.

"I was astonished, I had thought of the Duke of Melvorne as a shrewd business man, ready for any undertaking to make money. He was a new soul to his character; a fond memory of other days held a warm place in his heart.

"Now I see, after a few moment's silence, "for an answer to my question. Of what were you dreaming when I disturbed your reveries?"

"I was dreaming of one I long to see. Yet, too, have loved and lost, but not in the way you did. My fancy was painting the humble class, not rich or proud, but a good, pure woman, who gave me the first impulse toward a useful life, that ever stirred in my breast. I was a careless, thoughtless fellow, when she came to Waverland, in her active, happy life made me ashamed of the idle one I led. From her influence I have tried to do some good. My father was one absorbed in business, his estate had been neglected until the old house itself was going to decay. She came as governess to my little sister, and soon she was governess, housekeeper and almost estate keeper. By an unfortunate event from my mother she was able to feel her dependence, and she left Waverland one day when I was away from home. She did not know how dear she was to me. Though I have sought her far and near, I can find no clew of her whereabouts. That is my story. I was of the belief that I was thinking when you came to me."

"I have often thought what little things can change our lives," said the Duke. "Yet they are not, the little things, they are the real, sensitive, living, though unseen, parts of our existence."

After that exchange of confidence the Duke and I were greater friends than ever. We had many pleasant visits as we rambled over our world, whose first exclusive metal birthday was still fresh in everybody's mind. We reached Sandy Hook at night. The water made brilliant by the lights of her buoys, each of which carried a wonderful electric light.

"I officered the Duke." We extricated ourselves from the throng at the wharf, and were soon comfortable in our rooms at the hotel. After a good night's rest we were out to see the wonders of the city. A ride on the elevated railway gave me a peep into the streets. It was quite a novel way of flying through space, only we could look into people's houses in our flight. We visited the art galleries and were surprised that American artists can hold so high a position in the world of art.

One day we were standing near the courthouse steps, when a fine looking gentleman, little past the middle of life, passed up into the building.

"That," said the duke, "is Mr. Arthur, the ex-president of the United States."

"A fine looking man," I said.

"But what a queer way they have here of disposing of those who have held the highest office in the nation. They do not have even a badge of honor presented to them!

"When ex-president Grant was in England I attended a reception given him on one occasion. The diplomatic corps were invited to meet him. A question was raised as to who should occupy the seat of honor at table. The ambassadors who represented their sovereigns would not accord the seat to Mr. Grant (a private citizen.) But at last an arrangement was made by which no one held the seat of honor. It was a most awkward position for the general."

"I wonder if they are Americans!"

"It seems to me that the ex presidents should have some well defined official rank. As wealthy as this people are and as prosperous they are of their great nation. It is strange that they will permit those who have been exalted to the highest place in the gift of the people to settle back into the rank of private citizens again," I said.

"That is their idea of democracy. It destroys distinctions in all, rather than foster them."

"But a man's knowledge after a term of service would be of value to this country."

"So it would, but they choose to deprive themselves of that and send him back among the people, merely as an object of curiosity. That they are horrified to talk about it, and some honorable position with proper pay will be provided for ex presidents and perhaps for ex senators also, one of these days."

At the close of one of our busy days of sight seeing, as we sat in our room, enjoying a rest, I said:

"I do not wonder now, where Parnell got his independence of character when I remember that his mother was an American woman."

"Why so?" asked the duke, looking puzzled.

"These people have such a live, energetic way, that one now knows the secret of pluck came from that dared to make Boston Harbor into a huge teakettle, and to put a whole ship load of tea into it for one steeping."

"That's a new idea," laughed the duke. "But the Yankees are a shrewd, keen people, that will dare anything for principle."

"This very air has caught the spirit of the inhabitants. There is no drowsy fog to keep one in bed till ten o'clock in the morning here. I would caution the ladies of the old world to look at Lee before they pick a quarrel with this strange people."

"I am pleased at that, for with the example of ancient Rome, and the later one of Ireland, with its terrible want and suffering before it, I should think that they would take warning and keep the lands for the many and not grant them to the few."

"The people have not awakened to the truth of the situation as yet. When they do it will be too late unless they are wise, and deem what is now held by fraud, and there will be a terrible struggle if they ever try that. The men who hold the lands will never yield one acre unless compelled to do so."

"You might have to give up some of your possessions if it came to that," I said.

"Yes. So I am going to begin now and prepare for by buying city farms with long lease hold titles. I can hold the other lands till they pay me well for my investments and then sell."

"Where are you thinking of buying?"

"In Illinois, I think. From Lord Sanders' account, that is a good state for land lords."

"In what way is Illinois better than the other states?" I asked.

"Lord Sanders says the legislature has passed every law that the landlords have asked for to protect the land owners. Therefore you can make any bargain you like with your tenants, and if they fail to live up to the agreement you can turn them off and have a peaceful right to the land."

"Why, can that be true?" I asked, as I thought of the long pictures I had painted of America as a nation of homes with no landlords to grind the poor tenants down to degradation and poverty, but a free and happy people with their little homes, cottages and broad fertile acres in fee simple!

CHAPTER XII.—SHORT SERMON.

Chicago! What wonder of the age, whose first Sunday school teacher is still living! What shall I say for it! Twice it has been laid in ashes. But with the nerve and push peculiar to this people of the West, they have rebuilt with greater beauty than before.

We took a morning drive through the parks that surround the city like selected remnants from the garden of Eden. Here the weary long for the beauty of nature, the fragrance of flowers and the songs of birds, can enjoy them while reclining from the noise and confusion of about him. Here, that we found, is characteristic of the people of the West. One evening we stood by the bridge on Wells street, and saw the great Northwestern depot, watching a tug boat towing in a large vessel, when the whistle announced a train coming in. We were grabbed by the arm the ladies that were walking with them and rushed ahead. Children ran with their nurses. Fond mothers who could not run. All was bustle and confusion. I thought there surely must be a collision of some kind, but all did reach that or go without their dinners.

Just as the bridge began to turn a querulous old woman, her arms full of bundles, and an umbrella in her hand, came rushing up the walk, turning to a leisurely, long-checked girl with her, she said:

"There, we'll be left! That is our train standing there just ready to go! Susan Jane'll think we're lost!"

"Oh, aunt, its only an hour to the next train, and I'm sure Susan Jane," said the young lady with composure.

"Only an hour!" I said to the duke. "Why, I thought it might be a matter, at least, from the fussyest hurry these people make."

"You'll get used to this," laughed the duke. "They must hurry to make room for the next crowd. There are one hundred and fifty thousand people who come and go in this city every day."

"Then I do not wonder at the rush. It takes strange vehicle to move people come from and go to," I said, soliloquizing.

The Board of Trade attracted our attention. It is a very large building, and the immense interior is finely finished. Having tickets we were admitted to the visitors gallery. It is a magnificent room, with massive pillars, frescoed ceilings, beautiful pictures and finely wrought balconies.

"The people of Chicago may justly be proud of this building," said the duke. "It is the third time they have built since the fire of 1871. The first was a little wooden structure. Then a fine stone building was erected. This in turn became too small and public for them, so they have built this one."

"Well, this ought to satisfy them for some time to come. Not more than five years. One might almost think that he was at the ancient tower on the plains of Shinar."

"Only see how few of the men are of even middle age," said the duke. "Some look like school boys. They never were in this wild exciting rush of speculation, in fascinated with the hope of success, or vain by struggling against defeat."

"Are you fascinated with their workings?" I asked.

"I understand it takes thousands of dollars to become a member."

"What do they mean by throwing their hands out in that frantic style?"

"They are bidding in that very act some one may be financially ruined."

"How can that be," I asked, puzzled to know how such an act could ruin anyone.

"They buy and sell on what they call a margin, and they may exceed the amount they have on deposit. The prices of grain are in a measure established here before the seed is sown or the crops grown."

From the Board of Trade we visited the panorama Buildings where the battles of Shiloh, Missionary Ridge, and Gettysburg were represented. In the rotunda of art the hand of man has so skillfully represented the spirit of the scenes that all are startled to realize as clearly as the sound of whistling bullets and bursting shells. The wounded, dead and dying were so life-like that the full tide of suffering for and to help care for the suffering. As we stood leaning over the railing trying to separate the real from the ideal, a tall, dark looking man came and spoke to us.

"There, that man on the bay horse in the gray uniform occupies the position I held in that battle."

When he ceased speaking, a slender man with a gray beard turned toward him, say ing:

"That man on the gray horse in the blue coat is occupying the position I held in the same battle."

"Then you are General Prentiss," said the first speaker."

"And you are Marmaduke," was the answer first they shook hands as cordially as though they had never drawn swords against each other in deadly conflict. On inquiry we learned that nearly one thousand men who were in the battle of Shiloh have visited this wonderful painting.

Our stay in Chicago was a continual round of excursions and sight seeing. One morning we ascended the 276 steps and found ourselves in the tower of the water works. The city lay beneath us almost a solid block of masonry and architecture. The crib in the lake, two miles distant, seemed but a very few rods away. It was a clear calm morning. The lake was like an immense mirror reflecting back every large object upon its bosom. The sail and steamers came into port with a quiet majesty, ascending the slips and canals that penetrate the city, making the great prairie landscape brilliant with masts and spars along the extended and still extending wharfage. It was a scene of beauty, blended with business of nature and commerce, of God and man. We remained silent a long time, trying to grasp the extent of the scene and its many interesting points, when the duke broke the silence by saying:

"This is indeed, a wonderful city, when we remember that not one generation has passed away since the country here was all in marshy waste, an impassable, uninhabitable swamp.

"Yes," said I, "and remember the great fire that have swept through it. Two or three times the electric wires have blighted with the terrible words, 'Chicago is burning!' until it seemed there could be nothing left to burn."

"Yet look around and see the stately buildings that greet the eye on every side, while from every quarter the masts and spars proclaim a great trade center."

"Are there so many branches of the river?" I asked.

"No, those," said the duke, pointing out the different lines, "are canals or slips opened for the use of boats. Whenever trade or business needs more room, or an outlet to the lake, men are ready to do the work for the earth that is to be removed. It is taken to other parts of the city where it is used to bring the grade up to the city level."

"Then here the old adage is worked out, that nothing should ever be thrown out."

"Yes, even the debris from the burnt district made the foundation for one of the finest estates in the city."

After the noon lunch I suggested that we visit Lincoln Park.

"Shall we take a carriage or the street cars?" asked the duke, as we left the lunch room.

"Oh, let us walk," I said. So we started along leisurely, enjoying the different objects of interest.

"Do you know what that building is that is covered with vines and shaded by those great trees that seem older than the city itself?" inquired as we came to a handsome stone building.

"No, but I think it must be some old monastery built by the Jesuits when they roamed over the western world," said the duke.

"And those fine buildings in the yard must be the different seats of learning," I suggested.

"Here is a man in uniform, I'll ask him," said the duke, stepping forward.

"Sir, what is this old building, covered with ivy?"

"Potter Palmer's residence, sir!" said the man, looking quite surprised that anyone need to ask such a question.

"And those outer buildings, what are they?"

"Potter Palmer's stables, sir!" said the man with a peculiar smile.

We had been the guests of Mr. Palmer's daughter and her husband in London. You may imagine our surprise, and, I must confess, chagrin, to think that we had mistaken a private residence for a church or grand old. After that "Potter Palmer's residence" became a by word with us.

Lincoln Park is one of the finest in the city. It is the zoological garden of Chicago, and full of interest from the extensive and fine collection of animals. The objects that called for our special attention were the sea lions. They were playing in the water, diving and swimming, or sunning themselves in the little artistic lakes and caves that had been prepared for their use. The little polar dogs were a novelty to us. Their little mounds of earth gave me my first view of life on the great plains of the West.

Simple Sick Room Remedies.

Simple things are often of much benefit, and those in use and common table salt have much that is useful about them. Lemon juice and water without sugar, drank in draughts relieves one of a severe headache in a short time, and half a gill of lemon juice taken three times a day in water is found a very good for rheumatism. Nothing is so acceptable to a feverish person as lemonade, and for a cough that refuses to yield to ordinary treatment the following preparation will succeed. Take the white of an egg beaten stiff; then add the juice of a lemon and two or three tablespoonfuls of loaf sugar have been dissolved and keeping it near at hand take a teaspoonful of it at a time until relief comes. This will give immediate comfort, add to it one teaspoonful or more of the best Santa Cruz rum. A very good way to take lemon juice is to squeeze the juice of a lemon into a cup that is half filled with cold water letting them boil until they are soft; then squeeze the juice out, adding some more fruit as any other way, and adding sugar to thy taste, or to every half pint of juice put one teaspoonful of loaf sugar and a few other comfortable use for lemons is to bind a thin slice upon a corn that is troublesome at night and it will generally relieve it. It will entirely remove the soreness. Then if thy hands are stained from medicine or any other cause, rubbing them with a lemon after the juice is mostly extracted, will restore them. Table linen or any such articles that have become stained may be restored by the application of lemon juice and table salt, then placed in the sun. Claret stains can also be removed by rubbing in at once table salt; and stains of blood may be removed by rubbing dry starch in at once, and repeating it.

We are all apt to overlook the benefits we can secure from the use of these common articles; but in salt we have a blood purifier, as well as one always at hand. For sore throat, now so prevalent, a teaspoonful of salt should be in a half tumblerful of water, and used as a gargle, is very efficacious. It can be used once an hour or oftener, or three times a day, as needed. In attacks of bleeding at the lungs, salt taken dry is often a benefit. Salt and water, if held in the mouth, will at once relieve a toothache, or camphor can be added to it and applied.

Salt and cider vinegar will cure chilblains or frostbites, and hair can be so often given by sea captains, for such trouble at sea. A mixture of the white of an egg and salt, if applied in time, will disperse a felon, and the coating of an egg itself is very good for a boil.—Good Housekeeping.

Not Exactly Biblical.

I was following a rough and rugged road running along the French Broad river in Eastern Tennessee when a man with a rifle in his hand stepped into the trail ahead of me with a surly, "Stranger?"

"Stranger?" I saluted in return, and he looked cautiously up and down the road and around him and inquired:

"Be you one of any old man with a coon-skin cap on?"

"No."

"Haven't seen old Adams back that anywhere gunning for me?"

"No. Are you out for a shoot?"

"Wall, old Adams is gunning for me, and I'm gunning for him. We doan' snuggle (agree) on a mewl trade."

The day was warm and I was tired, and so I sat down on a rock and asked him to sit beside me, and then I began to talk to him about the commandments of the Saviour.

I salted in return, and he looked cautiously up and down the road and around him and inquired:

"Be you one of any old man with a coon-skin cap on?"

"No."

"Then what does he'un do it?" he queried.

And why do you do it?" I retorted.

"But let he'un come to me and own up and ask fo be forgiven."

"But why don't you go to him?"

We had talked for half an hour and he was starting to go his way, thinking me a clear calm morning. The lake was like an immense mirror reflecting back every large object upon its bosom. ONE OF LINCOLN'S LETTERS.

It Was Short, but It took Him Five Hours to Write It.

Francis B. Pierpont, of Fairmont, W. Va., who is in Pittsburg on private business, is the well-known war governor of West Virginia. In the course of an interview he said to a N. Y. Sun correspondent: "Mr. Lincoln's shrewdness as a statesman led him to carefully weigh every word he spoke or put upon paper, and to look at his official utterances from all points of view and judge of their probable effect in all quarters. An instance in point is his permission for the rebel legislature of Virginia to meet for the purpose of recalling the state troops from Lee's army. That permission, given in a note to Gen. Weitzel, comprises but a dozen lines in Nicolay and Hay's history in the Century, but Mr. Lincoln himself told me that its composition occupied five hours of intense mental activity. I regard the letter as a literary curiosity. It was the loyal governor of Virginia at the time, and Mr. Lincoln deemed it necessary to say something to me about so extraordinary a measure as permitting the rebel legislature to assemble when it was a loyal legislature, with a loyal governor, was in existence and was recognized by the federal government.

"Mr. Lincoln's note to Gen. Weitzel read:

"It has been intimated to me that the persons who have acted as the legislature of Virginia in support of the rebellion may now desire to assemble at Richmond, and take measures to withdraw the Virginia troops and other support from resistance to the general government. If they attempt it for that object, you will permit them, until, if at all, they attempt some action hostile to the United States, in which case you will notify them, and allow reasonable time to leave, and at the end of which time arrest any who remain. Allow Judge Campbell to see this, but no one else. Show it publicly.

"There seems to be nothing very wonderful about the composition of this order, continued Gov. Pierpont, "yet it took five hours to write it—five hours of uninterrupted stillness, too, for it was written between 9 p. m. and 2 a. m. You see Mr. Lincoln's difficulty. He knew that if the rebel legislature recalled Virginia rebel soldiers in the field would be the same as a number of men had been captured by Gen. Grant. Yet he had studiously to refrain from recognizing the rebel legislature, and must steer clear of the loyal government of Virginia, and it required five hours' hard work to do it to his satisfaction and order an order which he could defend to all critics. I think no act of his administration shows his political shrewdness more clearly.

"Mr. Lincoln also told me, what is not mentioned by Nicolay and Hay, that for secret private instructions to Gen. Weitzel to disperse the gentlemen who have been acting as the legislature of Virginia in support of the rebellion' as soon as they had withdrawn the state's support, thus giving them no opportunity to attempt any action hostile to the United States, but I do not think that this part of the incident has ever been made public.

"The capacity of Mr. Lincoln is shown in the events at Richmond after Gen. Weitzel had shown the letter to Judge Campbell. The rebel legislature did not come as he had feared, and he foresaw that an attempt would be made to construe his permission into a virtual recognition of the action of the rebel legislature. Such was the case, for in the call for the meeting of the rebel legislature, published in the Richmond papers, the committee announced that the military authorities of the United States had consented to the session of the legislature in Richmond, and stated that the matters to be discussed are the restoration of peace to the state of Virginia and the adjustment of the questions involving life, liberty, and property that have arisen in the states as a consequence of the war.

Brigham Young's Big Family.

As a physiological fact, of the fifty-six children born to Brigham Young, not one was halt, lame, or blind, all being perfect in body, and of sound mind and intellect, no defects of mind or body save those general ones shared by humanity. The boys are a sound healthy, industrious, and intelligent group of men, noted everywhere for their integrity and for the excellent care and attention bestowed upon their families. In short the name Young is a synonym of a good, kind, faithful husband. Among them are lawyers, merchants, a railroad king, a farmer, a merchant, a civil engineer, and a manufacturer. One of them is a colonel in the United States army, while several have graduated from the Ann Arbor law school. The girls are finely developed physically, quick and bright in intellect, high-spirited, and often talented, especially in a musical way. A few of them were beautiful girls, and are still handsome women. All are nice girls, kind in disposition, generous and social in their natures. In short, outside of one or two of either sex, they are a family that anyone might well be proud to call his own. This is given by way of argument, not boasting.—North American Review.

The Great Forests of Africa.

In Stanley's report to the British Government in regard to his expedition for the relief of Emin Pasha he says: "One follows of the discovery of an immense forest. "We can prove that east and north and northeast of the Congo there exists an immense area of about 220,000 square miles which is covered by one unbroken, compact, and veritable forest. Through the midst of this forest we traveled for thirteen months, and in its gloomy shades many scores of our dark followers succumbed to the progress through the dense undergrowth of bush and ambitious young trees which grew beneath the imposing shades of the forest giants, and which was matted by arums, phrynia, and amoma, meshed by endless lines of cane, and covered inch by inch by great each-like convolvuli, was often only at the rate of 400 yards an hour. Through such obstructions as these we had to tunnel a way for the column to pass. The Amazon Valley cannot boast a more impervious or a more unfrequented forest. One which has more truly a tropical character, than this vast Upper Congo forest, nourished as it is by eleven months of tropical showers.

GENTLEMEN:—I have suffered intensely from biliousness and rheumatism for over three years and had tried so many remedies that I had lost all faith. Hearing of Hibbard's Rheumatic Syrup I bought a bottle and found that it helped me. I have now used four bottles, and it has restored my liver and kidneys to healthy action, and done more to purify my blood than anything I have ever taken. I am pleased to recommend as a powerful blood purifier and liver regulator.
