and thought. The newspaper strives to supply this popular need for the general current intelligence not had before to be hastily swallowed between slips of coffee at the break of day and sip of tea in the evening. The occupied man finds time to content himself with a brief glance at the day's news, fragments from time to time losing the connection of events and finding himself unable to sum up the real value of the various world happenings. The Detroit Evening News has realized this difficulty and with characteristic enterprising has sought to remedy it. There is now in the press a handsome magazine, "The Quarterly Register of Current Events," which the News has digested this mass of intelligence into 45,000 readers and for all those others who certainly will eagerly avail themselves of the valuable volume. This first number, which is promised early in February, contains a digest of the world's history for 1900's compact but appreciative epitome of all the essential events of the entire globe during the year just closed. The magazine is published by the News, and indeed will obtain in the latest of the News' public benefits their first clear insight probably into the really important events of the year.
