

A CHURCH REVERIE.

The time is a happy Sunday morn.
The place a verdant church.
The scene is a peaceful way,
From out its ivy porch.

The solemnity lay on my face,
As the hymn was sung;
His voice came like an organ's notes,
As he began to sing.

A STORY OF A PREACHER.

Jack Brighton was one of my little and most peculiar friends.
He was a preacher-pastor of a small church in a small Alabama town. He was not more than thirty when I met him, unassuming and one that strange things would have a strange and mysterious appearance stamped upon their countenances, unobtainable except to the extent that something wonderful or some great struggle had been going on.

I knew him for two years, was with him daily and found him a most devout and earnest man. He was undoubtedly his most intimate friends, but his eyes, his voice never uttered a word to me. Five years before he had suddenly appeared in the town, and was at all accounts of him.

For weeks the little Alabama town was shaken with excitement. No one could remember who found him, but the letter secret, but continued in the search. The people all loved him, and thought it a strange coincidence. "They knew him as a perfect man, whose knowledge, without sin. He must in his opinion, have been taken bodily to some place."

DOUGLAS JERROLD.

He had ideas in a long time about that were different from those of his peers. A story of a preacher with Jerrold short period of naval service may help us to understand his character.
