"August Flower"

"I have been afflicted with biliousness and constipation for fifteen years and first one and then another preparation was suggested to me and tried, but to no purpose. A friend recommended August Flower and words cannot describe the admiration in which I hold it. It has given me a new lease of life, which I was about to lose. Its good qualities and wonderful merits should be made known to everyone suffering with dyspepsia and biliousness." JESSE BARKER, Printer, Humboldt, Kas.

TWO GREAT REMEDIES.

The human citadel is open to attacks from two sources and saide from accident, these two are the avenues from which all of the maladies that afflict the race spring. The first of these are what is known as the excretory organs. These are the lungs, the kidneys and the skin. These suffer from congestion which takes the forth of colds. Starting from what is called a cold the maladies that result are wide spread ranging from a cough to consumption. They attack all ages and all stations. No one is free from these troubles, There is, however, a remedy that is a safeguard. This is REID'S GERMAN COUGH AND KIDNEY CURE. It contains no poison, and will heal any form of lung trouble or any malady that arises from a cold. The other class of disease arises from derangement of the digestive organs and result in constipation. When the bowels do not act the stomach soon refuses to digest the food, and we are troubled with indigestion, fever, and a long train of troubles that embrace a wide range of maladies. The LAXATIVE GUM DROPS will correct any difficulty of this sort. They contain nothing deleterious, but are safe and pleasant. Get them of any dealer.

Belgrave Mystery.

BY A. CURTIS YORKE.

"What more do you want?" the irrepressible Fothergill (who, for some unknown reason, had a bitter grudge against Denham) was heard to say at one of the clubs. "I don't want to say anything against the fellow; but hang it all, the thing seems clear enough. Here's a man found dead up who has been supposed to be dead, and who turns out to be Lady Denham's first husband. Has stormy interview with Denham, who is heard to threaten to kill him if he makes a certain statement again. Statement turns out to be that the fellow wants his wife—and very natural too. Next thing is that later on the same night he is found stabbed in the scrutory leading out of Denham's library. Denham himself looks queer both on that night and at the inquest, and is altogether as unlike an innocent man as he can well be. In my opinion he hasn't a leg to stand on."

As a matter of fact things did look black against Denham. The presumptive evidence against him, coupled with his own statements at the inquest, were complicated enough. The butler's evidence, too (well-meaning though that functionary was), corroborated by that of Miss Derohe, was damning in a small degree; and lastly, (and chiefly), certain private information given to the authorities on the day following the inquest by Lady Denham's maid, the above-mentioned Felise Derorne. Her statement was to the effect that on the night of the murder, half an hour or so before the body was discovered, she had gone into the library to fetch a wrap her mistress had left there. As she was about to leave the room she heard voices in angry dispute in the scrutory, one of which she recognized as Sir Keith Denham's, and the other as that of the deceased. She distinctly heard Sir Keith say, "I offer you the twenty thousand pounds for your silence. Will you take it?" Deceased answered, "No—nor a hundred thousand. I want my wife." Sir Keith then said, with a terrible oath, "You shall never have her. I will kill you first!" Then there was a struggle, and the sound of a scuffle, which was followed by a deep groan. She (Felise) tried to scream but could not, and trembling with horror, hid herself behind the window curtain. A few minutes later she saw Sir Keith come out of the scrutory, closing the door after him. He was panting for breath, his hair was disordered, his clothes were pulled about, and she particularly noticed that he held in his right hand a handkerchief literally soaked in blood. She also noticed that there was a large stain on his right hand cuff. This she saw distinctly, as he passed quite close to her. He went hurriedly out of the room and down the steps, and then came at a distance and saw him enter his dressing-room. She saw him some little time afterward dressed as usual, apparently free of the guilt. All this she absolutely swore to, and her statement did not vary in the slightest degree, even under the most severe cross-examination. When asked why she did not give this evidence at the inquest, she said she had not wished to get Sir Keith into trouble, but since then she had been disturbed in her mind lest some innocent person might be accused. She repeated her statement at the adjourned inquest (which took place three days later) with the result that the jury returned a unanimous verdict of wilful murder against Sir Keith Denham.

On the morning after his arrest Denham had been brought up for examination, had tendered a plea of not guilty, and after some formal evidence, had been remanded for a week. When two days of that time had gone by he was visited by Harcourt Kennard, who was keenly interested in the case, both personally and professionally, and was determined to employ all his skill and experience (and they were not inconsiderable) in the endeavour to clear his friend from the terrible charge that was hanging him. Hitherto however his efforts had been disheartningly futile.

Denham was lying on his bed, one arm flung across his face, when Kennard entered; but as the door opened and shut, he rose to his feet. He looked worn and haggard, and as if sleep had long been a stranger to him, which indeed it had. A kind of dull despair had taken possession of him. During these long weary days and nights of solitude, it had seemed to him that all chance of proving his innocence had been taken from him, and as though escape from the net of evidence surrounding him was impossible.

The two men shook hands in silence.

After a somewhat long pause Kennard said with an attempt at cheerfulness:

"Now, old fellow, you mustn't let yourself get into the blues you know. We shall soon have you out of this, if I know myself."

"You will do not believe me guilty, then?" said Denham, with a faint smile.

"Of course I don't," returned Kennard, somewhat sharply. "Don't be a fool."

"Thanks old chap," said Sir Keith, and his voice shook slightly. "Upon my soul, during the last few days in this desolate hole, I have half come to the conclusion that I haven't a friend in the world. Sometimes when I realize that I—Keith Denham—am here on a charge of murder, I think heaven! I think I must be mad, and the whole thing a hallucination of my brain. But tell me," he went on, with a feverish impatience in his voice, "how is my wife?—and much is she?"

"She has been ill, you know," said Kennard, slowly; "and she is still very far from well. She is staying with us just now. We thought it would be better for her, poor child."

"And—the boy?" continued the other, tentatively.

"Quite well. He is with us also."

Denham gave him a quick look of gratitude. Then with a muttered exclamation, he began to walk rapidly up and down.

"Oh, my God, it is hard!" he burst out suddenly. "Bitterly, cruelly hard!"

There was a fierce ring of despair in the poor fellow's voice as he spoke, and leaning heavily against the wall, he buried his face in his hands. It was not of himself he was thinking now, Kennard knew intuitively, nor of his wife—but of their son.

After a few minutes Denham looked up and pushing his hair impatiently off his forehead, he said abruptly, though trying to change the current of his thoughts:

"Have they found the knife—or whatever the fellow was stabbed with?"

"No. Had it not been for that I should incline to the belief that Verschoyle committed suicide, for Lady Denham swore she had seen him scramble and peculiar for about a year before his supposed death, and that the doctors said her he might become insane any day."

"Yes, I know," was Denham's gloomy answer. "The poor child was terrified to death of him; and as I've told you he acknowledged to having been in a lunatic asylum for nearly eight years."

"Yes, that's all been inquired into and found to be true," said Kennard, pulling his mustache thoughtfully. "I wish to heaven they had kept him there. For my part, I think he was insane when you saw him, but of course that can't be proved now. However, he couldn't stab himself unless he had some weapon; and he couldn't make away with the weapon altogether. And the whole place has been thoroughly searched. The most extraordinary thing to me, Keith, is the evidence of your wife's maid. That was what turned the scale against your guilt. It was utterly damning."

"I swear to you," burst out Denham, excitedly, "that that woman's story is the most infernal tissue of lies! I never put Verschoyle from the time he left my study until I saw him lying dead in the scrutory, and I never was in the scrutory the whole night until then."

"How about the stains of blood on the cuff of your shirt and on your handkerchief, both of which one of the housemaids testified to at the adjourned inquest to finding in a corner of your dressing-room?"

"Oh, that!" said Denham contemptuously. "That might have found half-a-dozen blood-stained handkerchief, I dare say. My nose bled awfully several times that night. It was the case, you know. If I'm in a passion. It came on suddenly just after dinner, and I recollect seeing that my shirt-cuff had a stain of blood on it. That was why I changed it."

"Well, it is a most unfortunate coincidence," said Kennard, with a frown, "and equally unfortunate that the things should have been sent to the wash before Felise Delinghall had to give her extraordinary information. The worst of it is, everything seems to corroborate the woman's story. Your wife's maid will swear to your threatening Verschoyle, and there is no denying that you had presumably very strong reasons for wishing him out of the way before his claim upon Lady Denham became known. Even the fact of your hurried re-marriage, which, of course, preceded the World's Fair.

Denham sprang to his feet with a passionate oath.

"What do you mean?" he said, hoarsely. "Do you, too——"

"Nor I don't enter yourself, my dear fellow," interrupted Kennard, very quietly. "I am speaking simply as a lawyer. I have already given you my word that I am thoroughly convinced of your innocence. So sit down, and let us talk the matter over calmly. It's certainly the most mysterious affair I ever had anything to do with. Clearly the man was murdered—but by whom? Another unfortunate point against you is that one, and one only, of the servants could know Verschoyle or had any cause of resentment against him except yourself and Lady Denham—and she of course, is out of the question."

"That will do, Kennard!" broke in Denham with flashing eyes. "I should say Lady Denham is out of the question. What are you trying to insinuate? By Heaven, I'll not already read. I soon shall be leave me alone!" he went on wildly. "I know as well as you do that circumstances are against me. I'll swear to it not for my wife—" He stopped suddenly, and threw himself on his bed, burying his face in his arms. Then he said, fiercely changing his position, and speaking in a dull, mechanical sort of way: "Does she—does my wife believe my guilty, then?"

"She does not," answered the other. "She is most vehement in her protestations of your innocence."

"Thank God for that!" murmured Denham.

Now look here, old man," said Kennard, seating himself on the bed and taking out his note-book. "I want you to give me as nearly as you can, the whole of your conversation with Verschoyle on that night. Take your time, but tell me everything."

But at the end of half an hour Kennard found himself about as wise as he was before.

As he walked homeward his thoughts were both troubled and perplexed. In his own mind there was no doubt of Denham's innocence. But that appearances were terribly against him he could not but confess. Men have been hanged before now on less evidence.

CHAPTER VIII.

News.

On the following day Denham had a brief interview with his wife. It was their first meeting since his arrest for Olive had been very ill. Even now she was barely by a state to undergo any further agitation.

Denham felt inexpressibly shocked at the terrible alteration in her beautiful little face; she seemed to have grown years older. He himself was looking thin and ill, as though from months of suffering. For a moment they stood silent, motionless looking into each other's eyes. Then, with a sobbing, bitter cry, Olive threw herself into his arms, and they closed round her protectingly. His whole heart trembled with the passionate consciousness that she believed in his innocence.

Neither spoke.

Some scenes are too sacred for description, however reverent, however sympathetic. This was one.

When Lady Denham returned from this sad interview with her unfortunate husband, she sent for Felise, and in a few bitter, stinging words dismissed her from her service. To all the faithful creature's protestations and prayers she turned a deaf ear. She was relentless, inexorable.

"I never knew until to-day," she said with slow, judicial calmness, "the lying accusations you have made against my husband. No—do not try to excuse your lies," she went on, turning on her with a flash of anger almost startling in its passionate hatred. "I will not listen. Go! let me never see your face again."

And other words, many and bitter, she heaped upon the head of the broken-hearted and half-incredulous Felise—words which cost her dear, for they transformed a faithful, adoring slave into an implacable enemy.

That evening, between eight and nine o'clock, Harcourt Kennard was in his study. He was feeling baffled and irritable, and intensely anxious for Denham's safety besides; for the chain of evidence against the accused man appeared, if anything, more incontrovertible than ever.

Suddenly the door bell rang loudly, and a few minutes later a slimly-built, quick-looking man, with keen, grey eyes and iron-grey hair, was ushered in. This was Simon Scott, at that time one of the cleverest detectives in Scotland Yard. He had been employed by Corlingham, who was passionately indignant at the terrible charge against his cousin, but hitherto all his (Scott's) efforts had been vain.

WORKERS AND THINKERS.

FUTURE OF ELECTRICITY.

It Is to Displace the Steam Engine and Revolutionize Industry.

Since in obtaining power from fuel by means of steam engines upward of 90 per cent is wasted in unused heat, while the power obtained represents scarcely more than 10 per cent of the real value of the fuel under the very best conditions, the question arises whether there may not be discovered a plan whereby a much larger percentage of the real value of the fuel may be turned to account as electricity, and through that to light, heat, drive engines, etc.

This question has at present no answer, according to electricity. The sun, so it has been alive in the minds of our most able engineers and thinkers for years, and some have striken hard to find a solution to the problem. Records of scientific discovery have been earnestly ransacked to find some clew or, as it were, a guiding point to point the way for the uncertain explorer. It now appears that we may be compelled to await some new discovery, some new adaptation of force, a new generalization before the way to the much-desired solution may be found. The effect on the general industrial and economic development of electricity which would follow the discovery of some not too complex means for realizing an economy of even 40 or 50 per cent of the energy value of fuel is indeed incalculable.

Then truly would electricity become the almost sole motive power in the production as well as the transmission of power. The steam engine would go out of use almost entirely. We should burn our coal, not under the engines; it would be consumed in electric generators. Our steamships would have their machinery replaced by such generators and their propellers would be turned by electric driving motors connected with the generators. The speed would be increased so as to still further shorten the time of the ocean voyage. The use of electricity as a heating agent would be vastly extended, and it goes without saying that our lighting would be also complished at much less cost.

A COLLECTION OF RELICS.

Many Rare Old Specimens Promised for the World's Fair.

The objects of historical value and interest which will be shown at the world's fair will be legion. One of the most interesting will be shown by Pennsylvania, the collection having been furnished mainly from Philadelphia under the auspices of a committee of its city council.

Among the objects of this collection are the chair occupied by Thomas Jefferson when writing the declaration of independence; the table on which it was signed; the inkstand used on that occasion; Thomas Jefferson's sword; chair of memorial woods, including parts of Columbus' house in Hayti; the writing desk of Valley Forge when Washington occupied that place with his army; sofa belonging to George Washington and used by him during the last illness; Delphix bench from pew in old Christ church occupied by Washington and Lafayette; punch bowl used by Washington at his wedding; other officers of the Revolutionary army, baby clothes made by Mrs. John Adams for her son John Quincy Adams, also mug that belonged to John Hancock; Penn's treaty elbow chair, Benjamin Franklin; electrical machine invented by him; Franklin's original model of John Fitch's steam-boat which ran between Philadelphia and Burlington from 1787 to 1790; signed copy of the act of Pennsylvania independence; fans used by Franklin at the court of France when he was minister there; coat of Washington's face, taken during life from original mold used for Hodon's statue; clocks of Benjamin Franklin William Penn and Oliver Cromwell running and keeping good time. Gilbert Stuart's portrait of Washington; Thomas Jefferson's hair; Pocahontas' necklace; surveying instrument used by William Penn in laying out the city of Philadelphia, and the famous liberty bell.

ON MATRIMONY.

Mary's Lover at Last "Caught On" to Papa Bending's Trick.

Papa Bending keeps a pretty sharp eye on his daughter Mary, and many a would-be lover has taken a walk for a few minutes conversation with the hard-hearted parent.

"You seem like a nice young man, and perhaps you are in love with Mary?"

"Yes I am," was the honest reply.

"Haven't said anything to her yet, have you?"

"Well, no, but I think she reciprocates my affection."

"Does eh? Well let me tell you something. Her mother died a lunatic and there's no doubt that Mary has inherited her insanity."

"I'm willing to take the chances," replied the lover.

"Yes, but you see Mary has a terrible temper. She has threatened to knife on me with intent to commit murder."

"I'm used to that—got a sister just like her," was the answer.

"And you should know that I have sworn a solemn oath not to give Mary a penny of my property," continued the father.

"Well, I'd rather start poor and build up. There's more romance in it, Mr. Bending," continued the lover.

"I heard all I wanted to hear, and that you were on trial for forgery, had to run away from London for bigamy, and served a year in prison for cattle stealing. I'm going to marry into your family to prove you a decent reputation. There—no thanks—good-bye."

Mr. Bending looked after the young man with his mouth wide open, and when he could speak he said, "Some hyena has given me away on my dodge."
