Cures Scrofula

Mrs. E. J. Rowell, Medford, Mass., says her mother has been cured of Scrofula by the use of four bottles of S.S.S. after she had been given up as incurable. Her case was one of the worst form of this ailment, and being reduced to a low condition of health, as it was thought she could not live.

INHERITED SCROFULA.

S.S.S. Cured my little boy of hereditary Scrofula, which appeared all over his face. For a year I had given up all hope of his recovery, when finally I was induced to use S.S.S. A few bottles cured him, and S.S.S. no symptoms of the disease remain. MRS. T. L. MATHENA, Mathersville, Miss.

HELL GATE.

Lo, where deep sunken roofs of passion hide
Beneath the troubled waters of my life!
Sharper than dart or keenest knife—
They rise and wreck my ships. Upon the tide,
Red as with blood, my fairest hopes have died.
My golden freights, forsaken in the strife,
Sunk in the sea and every wave is rife
With ruin, wrought by hate, and doubt, and pride.
God saw my need, and knew the remedy.
The mighty grief that could my heart consume.
His touch electric, softly, tenderly,
Upon my quivering nerves laid pitying pride.
"One grief unrivalled!" Then the waves swept free
Along the deepened channel of my soul.

The Actor's Story.

BY JOHN COLEMAN.

CHAPTER IX—CONTINUED.

"I—I—Mutley!" he growled; "shut I like that fat pig? Shut me out, the old beggar shall have it hot!" So saying, he made his way to the managerial sanctum where he gave Willie's message to Mr. Cantorel, with various verbal embellishments.

Old M—— merely scratched his ear with his pen, and said: "Dear me! dear me! a remarkable young man! Do you think he means it?"

"I don't think anything about it, sir; I'm quite sure of it."

"Hear you, then. What time does the mail go to-morrow?"

"Twelve o'clock."

"Well, well, come to me in the morning at eleven. Meanwhile I'll sleep on it."

Next day, at half past eleven, Jamieson was at the coach office with his baggage. He waited until ten minutes to twelve; then he booked for London and paid his fare.

Twelve o'clock came. He took his seat on the box beside the coachman, the guard blew his horn, the driver flourished his whip, and was about to start, when out down Leith Walk came the cabman, driving like a madman, flinging like a gampus. Waving his hat and his handkerchief, he called out, "Stop! stop!"

The driver pulled up exclaiming, "What's the row now?"

"Nothing," gasped the captain, "but you sir, Mr. Jamieson, come down a bit, you're wanted."

"Too late, captain," replied Willie. "Drive on, Coachy."

"But I tell you it's all right" roared the captain.

"Hamlet or nothing," said Jamieson.

"Oh! Hamlet, Othello, Macbeth—the whole lot of them, only come down."

"On your honor, sir?"

"On my honor as a gentleman!"

"All right!"—and Willie sprung down like a "genie of the lamp." Seizing his carpet bag, he spun over a half-crown (almost the last he had left) to the guard, and returned triumphantly to the cabman. Where the boys struck up "See the Conquering Hero Comes," to the intense annoyance of old M——, who couldn't avoid hearing the unpleasantness outburst of musical mutiny.

The following Monday Jamieson opened in "Hamlet," and was received with very great enthusiasm by a crowded house. "A call before the curtain with them not so cheap an honor as it is nowadays, and when at the end of the play he was called forward he was more than delighted. Just as he was about to make his exit a lady seated in the private box to his right threw him a laurel wreath, and disappeared as if by magic. Although he had barely time to catch a glimpse of her pale face and flashing eyes, he recognized the mysterious lady of the pony chaise at Aberdeen. As soon as he left the stage his quick eye detected a card which was attached to a sprig of ribbon. On one side these words were written in a bold, but feminine hand: "You told me once should I ever need a friend I might rely on you. I need one now."

On the other side was engraved,

"Miss Flora McAllister,
Athol House."

Below was written,

"At home to-morrow from twelve to five."

CHAPTER X.
"Athol House.

The morrow's post brought Jamieson a letter from Curly describing his impressions of London—of the theatre, the company, etc. The general tone was elate and confident, and he wound up by stating that his debut was fixed for the following Monday, and that he was to open as Dorincourt.

At noon Jamieson presented himself at Athol House—one of those wonderful old places twelve or fourteen stories high, the like of which is to be seen nowhere but in "Auld Reekie." Many memories went back I don't know how long, but the very room into which he was shown had once been inhabited by the Regent Murray, afterward by Claverhouse, and then by the great marquis himself."

It was now in semi-darkness—the blinds were all down. The atmosphere was so gloomy and depressing that he couldn't bear it, so he pulled up the curtains and let in the blessed sunshine. Looking through the window, he contemplated the wonderful picture before him. The valley winding at his feet, where the mail-coach runs, to the left the castle and the castle gardens, to his right Holyrood and Arthur's seat. Nearer stood the Calton Hill, a little to the left of that lay Leith, with the blue Firth beyond; right in front of him Prince's street and New Town.

The Abbotsford monument, which had only recently sprung into existence, stood forth conspicuous, and it glittered in the sunlight. It was a glorious panorama. There was no city in the world more beautiful than bonnie Edinburgh; but he had not ample time to explore and admire its beauties during the fortnight, so presently he turned away to look at the room. Here he beheld a grand piano, a few choice pictures were on the walls objects of art were scattered about in every direction. To his left, catching the light from the opposite window, stood a painter's easel, supporting a picture covered by an Indian shawl. On two or three stools were palettes, colors, brushes and other implements of the studio. His curiosity was excited by the covered picture, so he stepped forward, and removed the shawl. It dropped from his hands as he exclaimed, "Curly!" The painting was not quite finished, but the resemblance was so life like that it appected to see poor Donald start from the canvas—to hear him speak! While Willie stood lost in contemplation a soft, low voice murmured, as if in response to his unspoken thoughts, "Considering that it is only painted from memory, it is not a bad likeness is it, Mr. Jamieson?"

Turning round he saw Flora. He bowed, and, dexterously avoiding her proffered hand, coldly replied:

"You wished to see me, madam, and I am here."

There was a pause. You see they met under the shadow of a misunderstanding, and neither one of them knew exactly how to begin. She of course, deemed herself wronged. At one time she had made up her mind that she never would, never could forgive Curly. But after all she was a woman. She was alone in the world now, for her father had been dead for months. She did not even affect to bewail him, though in deference to the prejudices of society, she wore mourning. She was now free to think and act for herself. If Curly could only explain the past, if—

Of all her hopes and fears of the terrible trial through which she and her lover had passed, Willie knew nothing. He only knew that his friend had been cruelly wronged, and that she had been treacherously abandoned by the woman he loved. On the other hand, it must be remembered that it was she who had most reason to glory herself deceived and betrayed. Besides she was in total ignorance of what had occurred to Curly, or indeed what had become of him since he left Aberdeen. She had seen Willie's name announced at the theatre, and she felt convinced that if any man knew Curly's whereabouts Willie Jamieson was that man. She remembered, too, the promise of the latter on the night of the elopement. Hence it occurred to her as an inspiration to find in him an ally against her. He had accepted her invitation certainly, but he might apparently as well have been in Aberdeen, so cold and distant was his manner.

"Mr. Jamieson," she said, "you once told me that should I need a friend I might rely on you."

"I did say so, madam, and have happened since that night. You were then about to become the wife of the man whom you have since so cruelly abandoned."

"Stop, sir" she said, "one moment," and she went rapidly to an escritoire at the other side of the room, and taking out the fatal paper with Curly's signature, she continued, "before you speak further, perhaps you had better read this."

Jamieson read it. Then exclaimed:

"My God! What does it mean?"

"That is the question I ask myself by day, on my bended knees by night, on my sleepless pillow—but answer never came. I thought possibly you might have been able to explain."

"I know less, Miss M'Allister, than you know yourself. After you left Aberdeen together I never even heard from him until the day after I last saw you. The next morning brought four letters—one from you, one from Curly, and one from my mother. I was in my way to Dundee, where I found him in the infirmary—how, I have not the heart to tell you. That will be quite enough."

It was astonishing how calm she remained till he had recovered himself then he resumed and told her everything of which the reader knows already. It was her turn then. She kept one moment and chafed the next with clenched hands and set teeth she strode to and fro as she exclaimed:

"The villain! the cowardly, dastardly villain. Oh! that I were a man for your sake, Daniel Deempster!"

"Don't you waste your breath on that gentleman—leave him to me," said Jamieson. "Now if you please, Miss M'Allister, we have business forth, so give me your hand." She extended it frankly, and he kissed it reverently.

"Since the time I told you of," he continued, "your name has never passed between us but I know the poor fellow loves you still dearer than life."

"If he loved me, could he—could he have done this shameful thing?" And to call God to witness it, too. Oh the coward, the coward."

"We must take human nature as we find it. God help me for I am coward, and God help me for I can love him none the less. Do you love him less than I do?"

"I did love him once more than all the world, but oh! Mr. Jamieson," she exclaimed, "the M'Allisters have held their own in flood and field since Scotland was a nation. And a coward! Oh! I can't bear it." And she cast herself on the couch, and wept bitterly. Then she got up and pointed to the picture.

"Look there" she said, "does that look like a coward?"

"No," Willie replied, "and I don't believe he is a coward, but there are moments when the bravest man loses heart. Tell me one thing were they not armed?"

"Yes, they both had loaded pistols."

"And of course he was unarmed, defenseless! Ah! Curly, Curly, you would have slain him there and then, had he not signed that miserable paper. Besides, they worked upon his fears for you, and in a moment of weakness he yielded to their infamous threats."

"He ought not to have yielded—death, anything but dishonor would have avenged him first and bequeathed him after."

It was Willie's turn to wait now. When she had sobbed down a little she showed her sister he had received that morning. At the very sight of the well known hand her heart leaped with joy. She was ready to forgive, all was forgotten, forgiven.

Jamieson asked her permission to write to Curley to explain that he had been her, but she begged him to leave her to take her own course, which she did, with results to be hereafter stated.

CHAPTER XI.
The Fatal Anniversary.

Meanwhile Curly was busy with his rehearsals in town. At length came the debut. All through the earlier part of the play he impressed the audience most favorably, and each succeeding act confirmed the impression. The minuet in the masquerade scene was danced by him with such supple elegance that he completed his conquest. He was hailed by the public. The ladies were in raptures with the new comedian, and even the men were unwillingly moved to admiration. In the dénouement's scenes he secured a brilliant figure lay before him.

When he returned to his room to make his change for the last act a large parcel lay upon his dressing-table. He motioned the dresser to unpack it. When he had finished changing he looked at the contents of the parcel. There was a quantity of fine flowers, and a letter directed in the hand he knew so well. His heart stood still for a moment, then he took courage. It was from her, and the kind words perhaps, something to give him heart of grace. He tore open the envelope, and stood for a moment like a man transformed to stone.

Traced in characters of fire he saw the fatal words:

"These presents are to attest that Flora B'Allister is not my wife; and I call God to witness that neither now nor hereafter will I seek to become her husband.

SAVED BY A MIRACLE.

A Train Loaded with Passengers Falls from a 25-foot Bridge—One Man Killed.

The north bound Chicago express on the Lake Erie & Western railroad was badly wrecked about one mile south of Peru, Ind. Among the 15 passengers aboard the train only one was killed in injury. The entire train, consisting of engine, smoking, express and chair cars, was precipitated on the river bed in the Wabash river, 35 feet below. A broken rail about 100 feet from the river bank threw the engine from the track, and it continued on the ties until reaching the bridge, when the first car left the track, and the entire train went down. The engine stood upright, and the cars covered it with their wreckage.

The fireman jumped. Engineer Griffin was pinned in the cab and when found was scalded. The wreck took fire and was burned completely. The cars were smashed to splinters. Brakeman Richard Neff was badly injured, which was following. It was stopped only about 100 feet from the wreck and another smashup was averted.

It is miraculous no more were killed as the cars were hurled over stones and not a splinter of wood was saved from the fire.

Deafness Cannot Be Cured

By local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

If you have a hard rasping cough and a feeling of tightness across your chest, with fever, you must take care or you will have an attack of pneumonia. If this be the case, lose no time, but get a bottle of Reid's German Cough and Kidney Cure. It is the only cough remedy on the market that will instantly relieve pneumonia, because it is a stimulant but perfectly harmless so you can take it in any quantity, until you are relieved. If your druggist does not have it, write us on a postal card, giving your name and address and the name of this paper, and send to the Sylvan Remedy Co., Peoria, Ill. and we will send you a trial bottle by

BITS OF LEVITY.

Watts—Has Dr. Bowless any specialty? Potts—O, yes. Bills.

She—What's your objection to Wagner's music? He—It's so noisy you can't hear it.

He—Do you think I could get a pass on your father's road? She—No; they don't pass anything but dividends on his road. I've heard him say so.

"How do I look?" asked the turkey as he expanded his gorgeous array of feathers. "Fit to kill," replied the sardonic observer, who is so tough he can't be eaten.

Little Tommy—Say, are you engaged to my sister or are you not? Algernon, blushing furiously—I am—no, not, Tommy, but I would like to be. Little Tommy—Come out from behind that door, sir. I knew I'd earn that quarter.

"I suppose you are anxious to get out?" said one of a visiting committee to a convict. "Yes, ma'am, indeed I am." "Want to begin life all over, I suppose?" "Not in particular, but I know where there's a hole in the head dead easy to break, an' I'm afeard some bloomin' chump'll get there afore me."

Silence is a hard word to find a rhyme for, so it is usually put at the beginning of a line. Walt. Whitman, who could make milk wagon rhyme with hubbard squash, could have given silence a chance at the end of a line, to rhyme with, say, politics. It was a Boston poet, by the way, who made pterodactyl rhyme with cocktail.

Bank Director—Why didn't you invite our cashier's little girl to your party?" Small Daughter—She always wears such awfully expensive end of a hair ribbon, that it makes everybody else feel ashamed.

First Boy, in art gallery—All these historical pictures is about foreign countries. Why don't the artists paint pictures of American history? Second Boy—I guess 'cause Americans always kep' their clothes on.

"I say, Anna, my husband came home very late last night; can you tell me what time it was?" "Please, ma'am, I don't know exactly; but when I got up this morning master's topcoat was still swinging backwards and forward—on the peg."

A great cure for cough—Mrs. A. K. Morris, of Philadelphia, Pa., writes: "I had a severe cough, and tried Piso's Cure. One bottle of this excellent cough syrup cured me, and I have used it in my family for a bad cough and was entirely cured."

The Romans were very fond of dog-fish, star-fish, porpoises and seals.

The best remedy for rheumatism, Mr. John Sadler, Deseronto, Ont., writes, is Hagyard's Yellow Oil for it has cured me after all else failed. It is the best remedy I can recommend to a friend, and I shall always keep it in the house.

Piles vary that snails were fattened till their shells held three quarts.

A Cough, Cold, or Sore Throat should not be neglected when Brown's Bronchial Troches will give immediate relief, and give prompt relief. 25 cts. a box.

Lane's Medicine Moves the Bowels Each Day. In order to be healthy this is necessary. For constipation, headache, kidney and liver troubles take Lane's Family Medicine. 50 cts. and $1.00 at all dealers.

The Greek cooks could serve up a pig roasted on one side, the other side roasted.

Cleanliness exercise and diet are the cardinal points of good health. Take care of the first two and if you know what and how much to eat you will never be ill. If a laxative is needed Tutt's Pills are highly recommended. Use no other.
