"German Syrup"

JUDGE J. B. HILL, of the Superior Court, Walker county, Georgia, thinks enough of German Syrup to send us voluntarily a strong letter endorsing it. When men of rank and education thus use and recommend an article, what they say is worth the attention of the public. It is above suspicion. "I have used your German Syrup," he says, "for my Coughs and Colds on the Throat and Lungs. I can recommend it for them as a first-class medicine."—Take no substitute.

TWILIGHT BRIDGE.

I know a little fairy bridge that spans a tiny stream,
And there the sky is ever clear, for life is like a dream.
As the silvery stream goes rippling, running onward to the sea,
While the little birds are singing in an ecstacy.

The path one side the Shy stream is bright and busy Day,
And Night, a forest dark and drear, lies just across the way.
But the fairy bridge called Twilight, clasping hands between the two,
In the brightest, dearest spot on earth a moment man e'er knew.

For when the day has passed away I meet my sweetheart there,
While in the rippling stream beneath I throw all my care,
And just the fallen shadows and the sunset glow above
Watch o'er the little Twilight bridge and witness to our love.

—Judge.

SOBER SECOND THOUGHT

"I must have it, George," said Mr. Whitman's handsome little wife. "So, don't put on that sober face."

"Did I put on a sober face?" asked the husband with an attempt to smile, that was any thing but a success.

"Yes, sober as a man on trial for his life," she replied. "There, dear, clear it up, and look as if you had at least one friend in the world. What money-lovers you men are!"

"How much will it cost?" inquired Mr. Whitman. There was another effort to look cheerful and acquiescent.

"About six pounds," was answered, with just a little faltering in the lady's voice, as she knew the sum would sound extravagant.

"Six pounds! Why, Mary, do you think I am made of money?" And, Mr. Whitman's countenance underwent a remarkable change of expression.

"I declare, George," said his wife, a little impatiently, "you look at me as if I were an object of charity, instead of affection. I don't think this is kind of you. I've only had three silk dresses since we were married, while Amy Hollis has had seven or seven during the same period, and every one of hers cost more than mine. I know you think me extravagant, but I wish you had a wife like some women I could name, I rather think you'd find out the difference before long."

"There, there, pet, don't talk to me after this fashion. I'll bring you the money this evening; that is, if—"

"No ifs or buts, if you please. The sentence is complete without them. Thank you, dear!" I'll get down to noon and buy the silk. So don't fail to bring the money. I was in Oxford street yesterday, and saw one of the sweetest patterns I ever beheld. Just suits my style and complexion. You shall be inconsolable if it's gone. You won't disappoint me?" And Mrs. Whitman laid her soft, white hand on the arm of her husband, and looked with sweet persuasion in her face.

"Oh, no. You shall have the money," said Mr. Whitman, turning off from his wife as she brought a chair for him, and hurrying from her presence. In his precipitation he had also forgotten the usual parting kiss.

"That's the way it is always," said Mrs. Whitman, her whole manner changing, as the sound of the closing street door came jarring upon her ears, "get my money, and away and at once there is a cloud in the sky. She sat down, pouting and half angry.

"Six pounds for a new dress!" mentally ejaculated the husband of the vain, pretty and thoughtless Mrs. Whitman, as he shut the door after him. "I promised to settle the coal merchant's bill to-day, and he knows where the money is to come from. The coal is nearly out, and more must be ordered. O, dear! I'm in trouble every year." And he struck his hindhand. This winter, I did hope to get a little advance; but if silk dresses are to be the order of the day, there's an end to that deceptive-to-be-wished-for circumstance. Debt—debt! How I have always shrunk from it! but steadily, now, is overpowering me. Oh, if I could but disentangle myself now, while I have the strength of early manhood, but the bonds that hold me are weak! If Mary could see as I see—if I could only make her understand rightly my position! Alas! that is hopeless, I fear.

And Mr. Whitman quickened his steps, because his heart beat quicker, and his mind was unduly excited.

Not long after Mr. Whitman had left home, the postman delivered a letter to his sister-in-law. She examined the writing on the envelope, which was in a bold hand, and said to herself as she did so, "I wonder who this can be from?"

Something more than curiosity moved her. There intruded on her mind a vague feeling of disquiet, as if the missive bore unpleasant news for her husband. The stamp served it to be a city letter. Several times of late such letters had come to his address, and she had noticed that he read them hurriedly, and put them without remark into his pocket, and became suddenly silent and gloomy.

Mrs. Whitman turned the letter over and over again in her hand, in a thoughtful way, and looked at the big image of her husband, sober-faced and silent as he had become for most of the time of late, presented itself with equal address. Sympathy stole into her heart.

"Poor George!" she said, as the feeling increased; "I'm afraid something is going wrong with him."

Placing the letter on the mantel-piece, where her husband could see it when he came in, Mrs. Whitman entered upon some household duties, but a strange impression as of a weight, lay upon her heart—a sense of impending evil—a vague, troubled disturbance of her usual inward self-satisfaction.

"If I only knew what that letter contained!" she said, half an hour after it had come in, her mind still feeling pressure which had come down upon it so strangely, as it seemed to her.

She went to the mantel-piece, took up the letter, and examined the superscription. It did not enlighten her. Steadily she became more assured that its contents were of a nature to trouble her husband.

"He's been a little mysterious of late," she said to herself. This idea affected her very unpleasantly. "He grows more silent and reserved," she added, as though in the midst of feverish excitement, became active in a new direction. "More contemplative, as it were, and less interested in what goes on around him. His coldness chills me at times, and his irritation pains me."

"Something has gone wrong with him this year!" she said aloud, as this feeling grew stronger. "What can it be?" The letter was still in her hand. "This may enlighten me."

With careful fingers she opened the envelope, not breaking the paper, so that she could seal it again if she desired to do so. There was a bill for fifteen pounds, and a communication from the person sending the bill. He was a jeweler.

"If this is not settled at once," he wrote, "I shall take proceedings. It has been standing for nearly a year; and I am tired of getting excuses instead of money."

The bill was for a lady's watch, which Mrs. Whitman had almost compelled her husband to purchase.

"Not paid for! Is it possible?" exclaimed the little woman in great astonishment, while the blood mounted to her forehead.

Then she sat down to think. Light began to come to her mind. As she sat thus thinking, a second letter for her husband came in. She opened it without hesitation. Another bill! and another dunning letter!

"Not paid! Is it possible?" she repeated.

It was a bill of four pounds for boots and slippers, which had been for three or four months.

"This will never do!" said the astonished wife—"never—no, never! She thrust the two letters into her pocket in a resolute way; and from that hour until the return of her husband she did an unusual amount of thinking for her little brain. She felt that the morning's letter that the morning cloud had not passed from his brow.

"Here is the money for that new dress," he said, taking it from his vest pocket, and handing it her as he came in.

He did not kiss her, nor smile in the old bright way. But his voice had a tone in it not cheerful. A kiss and a smile just then would have been more precious to the young wife than a hundred silk dresses. She took the money, saying, "Thank you, dear." It is kind of you to comply with my wishes."

Something in her voice and manner caused Mr. Whitman to lift his eyes to her face with a look of inquiry. But she turned aside, so that he could not read its expression.

He was graver and more silent than usual, and ate with scarcely an appearance of appetite.

"Come home early, dear," said Mrs. Whitman, as she walked to the door with her husband.

"Are you impatient to have me admire your new silk dress?" he asked, with a faint effort to smile.

"Yes. It will be something splendid," she replied.

He turned off from her quickly and left the house. For a few minutes she stood, with a thoughtful countenance and her whole manner completely changed. Then she went to her room and commenced dressing to go out. Two hours later, and we find her in the jeweler's shop.

"May I speak a word to you?" she said, addressing the owner, who knew her very well.

"Certainly," he replied; and they moved to the lower end of one of the long show cases.

Mrs. Whitman drew from her pocket a lady's watch and chain, and laying them on the glass case, said, at the same time holding out the bill she had taken from the envelope addressed to her husband, "I cannot afford to wear this watch; my husband's circumstances are too limited; I tell you so frankly. It should never have been purchased; but as too-indulgent husband yielded to the importunities of a foolish young wife. I say this to take the blame from him. Now, sir, meet the case if you can; do not in his absence unwisely. Take back the watch, and say how much I shall pay you besides."

The jeweler paused a little to think. The case took him a little by surprise. He stood for nearly a minute, then taking the bill and watch, he said, "wait a moment," and went to a desk.

"Will that do?" He had come forward again, and now presented her with a receipted bill. His face wore a pleased expression.

"How much have I to pay you?" asked Mrs. Whitman, taking out her pocket book.

"Nothing, he replied. "The watch is unin jured."

"You have done a kind act, sir," said Mrs. Whitman, with a tremulous voice. "I hope you will not think unfavorably of my husband. It's no fault of his that the bill has not been paid. Good morning, sir."

Mrs. Whitman drew her veil over her face and went with light steps and a light heart from the shop. She plainly saw that he was receiving her watch was not to be compared with what she now felt in parting with it. From the jeweler's she went to the haberdasher's, and paid his bill; from thence to her milliner's and settled for her last bonnet.

"I know you're dying to see my new dress," said Mrs. Whitman gaily as she drew her arm within that of her husband on his appearance that evening. "Come up stairs and let me show it. Come along! Don't hang back. George! You were afraid."

Her manner had undergone a change. The brightness of her countenance had departed. She took something in a hurried manner from a drawer, and calling up a footstool, placed it on the floor near him, and sitting down leaned upon him, looked tenderly and lovingly into his face. Then she handed him the jeweler's bill.

"It is receipted, you see," and her voice fluttered a little.

"Mary! how is this?" he asked. "What does it mean?"

"I returned the watch," she replied, "and Mr. Rose receipted the bill. I would have re paid him for any damage, but it was uninjured, and he would not take anything."

"Oh, Mary" said her husband.

"And this is receipted also; and this," she said, taking out the other bills which she had paid. "And now, dear, she added, quickly, "how do you like my dress? Isn't it beautiful?"—Saturday Evening Post.

David Copperfield.

Some interesting facts connected with Dickens' "David Copperfield" have been revealed by Charles Dickens, the younger. "I have," he says, "my mother's authority for saying—she told me at the time of the publication of Mr. Forster's first volume and asked me to make the fact public, if, after her death, an opportunity should arise—that the story was eventually read to her in strict confidence by my father, who, at the time, intimated his intention of publishing it by and by as a portion of his autobiography. From this purpose she endeavored to dissuade him, on the ground that he had spoken with undue harshness of his father, and especially of his mother, and that much success that he eventually decided that he would be satisfied with working it into 'David Copperfield.'"

Opinions Differ.

In regard to the decision of a Vermont judge that when a maiden discards her lover she must return the engagement ring he has given her, it is recalled that the ruling of an English court is that an engagement ring is not recoverable in any circumstances.

A Matter of Health

IT costs more to make Royal Baking Powder than any other, because its ingredients are more highly refined and expensive. But the Royal is correspondingly purer and higher in leavening strength, and of greater money value to the consumer. The difference in cost of Royal over the best of the others does not equal the difference in leavening strength, nor make good the inferior work of the cheaper powders, nor remove the impurities which such powders leave in the food.

Where the finest food is required, the Royal Baking Powder only can be used.

Where the question of health is considered, no baking powder but Royal can be used with safety. All others are shown by official analyses to contain lime, ammonia or alum.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.
