

CHASED BY INDIANS.

With the train, besides the drivers and the "boss," there were two lads about 12 years.

They were named Orville and Lester. Orville was the older of the two and was in the main excellent lad.

When they got out on the plains where game was plentiful they developed a perfect mania for hunting and every day they took their guns and secured the game.

Old Joe remembered with them and wanted them again leaving the wagon, but they only laughed at him.

"What of one thing," Orville asked, "you might run some Indians who take a fancy to your scalps."

"I don't care," Orville replied, "I would like to see some Indians who take a fancy to my scalps."

But the train of his words was brought to him by the unimpeachable manner a few days later and they were glad to see him.

When the train stopped at the station, Orville and Lester went off to the north and south of the prairie.

They had reached the top of the mountain and they were looking at the country that lay all about them.

Orville and Lester were looking at the country that lay all about them and they were looking at the country that lay all about them.

CHASED BY INDIANS.

Orville, having such the shortest distance to go, reached his position first.

He had expected the animal to be intended to shoot and was lying with his gun ready for instant use.

But he was not to be disappointed. The animal was not intended to shoot and was lying with his gun ready for instant use.

Orville glanced quickly in the direction of the timber and saw a dark Indian secretly slipping by.

He started in a panic and threw down his gun and turned and fled across the plain toward the timber.

Orville and Lester were looking at the country that lay all about them and they were looking at the country that lay all about them.

Orville and Lester were looking at the country that lay all about them and they were looking at the country that lay all about them.

Orville and Lester were looking at the country that lay all about them and they were looking at the country that lay all about them.
