

That Tired Feeling

It is remarkable how many people there are who have that tired feeling which seems to think it is of no importance that it is not really serious. They do not realize how serious the malady is. But they think they will get after a while and then they realize that they mean the legitimate weariness which all experience after a hard day's work, but that fatigue, weariness, feeling which is especially overpowering in the morning, when the body should be refreshed and ready for work. It is often only the

Light House

By CHARLES HOWARD.

COPYRIGHTED BY J.B.L. PINGGOTT COMPANY.

EVERY time it moved it moaned. On calm summer days when the sun shone brightly it seemed to rest in peace, as if meditating in silence on its grief. When gales swept over the waters, uncertain motions and mingled a dismal wail with the roar of the surf, the lighthouse moaned and moaned in sepulchral tones and moaned in sepulchral tones and moaned in sepulchral tones.

As for Mal herself she thought it curious spelling mystery some pretty good of her father's fancy and wore her name with becoming pride and dignity. It was her name, and it never entered her mind to ask what it meant. The old man knew in part, and so did the moaning buoy, but it would not tell, and the other spoke only in a mumble and understood nothing.

The season had fairly opened. The white steamboats had already begun to make their daily trips to Wilson's Hill from New London, Conn. The procession of vessels continually drifting along the horizon to the north-east, bound east or west between Long Island Sound and the Vineyard, and making for the open sea, had largely increased. Already a yacht or two were seen in the bay, and the yellow-green hotel and fantastic cottages were open and expectant of guests.

"What is his name?" I asked. "The name of the boat?" "No, the name of the man who lives in the cottage." "The name of the man who lives in the cottage?" "The name of the man who lives in the cottage?"

"What is his name?" I asked. "The name of the boat?" "No, the name of the man who lives in the cottage." "The name of the man who lives in the cottage?" "The name of the man who lives in the cottage?"
