The Pace That Kills.

Fast Work and Fast Eating Make Three Score Years and Ten a Ripe Old Age in These Days.

(From the Cincinnati Enquirer.)

The American people live too fast, eat too fast and drink too fast. This has brought upon many of us a train of serious and startling maladies that are very difficult to manage. Investigation and chemical analysis have discovered a remedy that will help those suffering from such ills has recently been discovered by Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, which has taken very high rank as a specific remedy.

L. P. Owens, a traveling man, thirty years of age, who is well known in his community generally, and likely besides he is a bright, energetic young fellow, resides with his mother at 330 Central Avenue, Cincinnati, Ohio. He has been a victim of dyspepsia which took the form of continuous headaches, and which, strangely enough, his mother suffered from the same trouble. Mr. Owens testified, in the interests of Pink Pills in a most unanswerable way, as I said to the Enquirer reporter:

"I am glad to do anything I can for Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, because they did me great good, and other people ought to know of their virtues as a medicine in stomach troubles. It was some time ago when I felt a heavy feeling in my stomach that grew very complicated. I did not consult a doctor, but bought several boxes of what I thought a box of them. In two or three days the heavy feeling in my stomach disappeared and I was relieved of my trouble. I did not have to use more than a box of them before I was entirely cured. I used to have only occasionally been troubled with constipation, and I never got worried about it because I knew just what to do. Mother was also troubled with indigestion and the Pink Pills did her good. Her sister tried them for me—cured her, didn't they, mother?"

"When appealed to Mrs. Owens unreservedly: "That is right. I found it was a great medicine, so easy to take and so quick and lasting in its results."

Mr. Owens continued: "I believe that these pills are a great blood purifier, too. When I had my stomach trouble I was also quite nervous and that disappeared with the dyspepsia. In fact all that I have said is claimed for them. You can bank any fact of this testimony as worth while."

H. P. Owens, his associate editorial positions of trust in this city, and he was for a time a member of the Ohio Legislature. He will go on the road in a few days for a prominent business house, and Mr. Owens is quite as enthusiastic as her son about the Pink Pills. At the same time friends can verify her good opinion of this wonderful remedy if they feel disposed to do so at any time. Mrs. Owens' residence is so general and unanimous as to the excellence of Pink Pills and their virtues, as found it to be there is certainly good reason to believe all the good things said—about the safe and simple remedy.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People contain all the elements necessary to give new life and richness to the blood and restore shattered nerves. They thus be kind of all forms of weakness. Sold from the Dr. Williams' Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y., at 50c per box, or six boxes for $2.50.

Uses for Aluminium.

"Perhaps you may doubt the veracity of my statement, young man," said a well known aluminium manufacturer to a representative of this paper recently, "but it is, nevertheless, true, that we are making artificial arms and legs of aluminium, and artificial ears have already been constructed of that metal. As an adjunct to the science of dentistry it needs no recommendation, its long use in this connection being a guarantee of its popularity. Yes, it is being used in a great many other ways, also, for horseshoes, army equipments, racing shells, cooking utensils, and is entering largely into the construction of yachts and torpedo boats, and, in fact, is being adopted wherever it is possible."

Broke the Tobacco Trust.

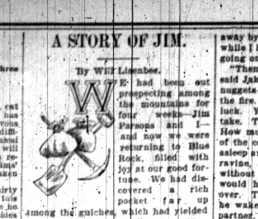
St. Louis, Sept. 8 (special).—Col. Wm. A. Kirchhoff, general western manager of the American Tobacco Co., has startled his numerous friends by stopping the use of tobacco. For years he had smoked twenty strong cigars daily, and a less quantity would leave him nervous and ill. The habit was undermining his health, and he tried to quit, but could not, until he took No-To-Bac, the medical miracle that has cured so many thousands of tobacco-users. Col. Kirchhoff's craving for tobacco has entirely gone, and he feels better than ever before. He is a great No-To-Bac enthusiast now. Over 30,000 tobacco-users have been cured by No-To-Bac, and the loss to tobacco manufacturers is easily over $1,000,000 a year.

Slaughter of Rabbits.

The annual Kiowa county, Kas., rabbit hunt took place Tuesday, and the event was celebrated near Mullinville with the usual grand ball and banquet. One hundred and sixty-five farmers and cowboys on horseback participated in the hunt and nearly 6,000 rabbits were killed. They will be shipped free over the railways and consigned to humane societies in Chicago and Cleveland. The Woods county, Oklahoma, hunt will take place next week at 1 nearly 400 horsemen will participate in it.

A STORY OF JIM.

By WILL Carleton.



WE had been out prospecting among the mountains for four weeks—Jim Parsons and I—and now we were returning to Blue Rock, filled with joy at our good fortune. We had discovered a rich pocket far up among the gulches, which had yielded us a small fortune in yellow nuggets.

All luck had followed us so long that this bit of good fortune seemed too good to be real, and more than once I guilty expected to awake to find it all a dream.

We were friends and schoolmates—Jim and I—and had come West two years before, to seek our fortune among the gold-bearing gulches of the Grand Rock mountains.

Our first day's journey lay across a spur of the foothills that stretched, bleak and barren, toward the blue rim of the southern horizon.

Night was already coming down over mountain and valley when we stopped in a small valley, threaded by a silvery stream, which dashed merrily over its rocky bed.

As soon as we had eaten a hasty supper, we stretched ourselves on our blankets, and, weary with our day's journey, we quickly fell asleep. The gray of early dawn was just lighting the mountain tops when I awoke, and started to call Jim. At the same time my eyes wandered instinctively to the head of our bed, where the sacks containing the precious nuggets had been placed. A single glance showed me that there were also missing.

I stood staring about me, stupefied and bewildered. In that brief moment a dreadful suspicion took possession of me—a suspicion that I nevertried hard to crush out, but which rapidly grew into a conviction—a suspicion that Jim Parsons was robbed.

It was a terrible thing to think of me. To lose the little fortune for which I had undergone so many hardships, and which had cost so much toil, was indeed hard; but I think I can truly say that the discovery of the baseness of one whom I had regarded as a true friend, sent a still greater pang to my heart.

In the midst of my gloomy reflections I tried to comfort myself with the faint hope that it was only a joke which Jim had played upon me, and that in a short time he would return. But hour after hour passed by, hope died out in my breast, leaving only the conviction that my first suspicions were true.

I had no heart for breakfast, and after lingering about the place for a couple of hours, I set about for Blue Rock.

After traveling some hours I sat down to rest in a deep glen. Near where I sat a small stream leaped over a wall of rocks and fell in a tiny cataract on the rocks below.

As I sat watching the play of the water, I suddenly espied what seemed like an opening back of the sheet of water, and on a closer investigation I saw that it was a cavern leading back into the cliff. I had not gone far before the discovery filled me with a resolution to explore it took possession of me.

Producing some torches from a patch of resinous bushes that grew near by, I leaped through the falling stream to the mouth of the cavern. I found myself in a cave of considerable size, and extending back as far as I could not discern.

Lighting one of the torches, I began to make my way through the winding passage, which grew wider and more spacious as I advanced. I had traveled but a short distance when I was suddenly startled by the sound of voices, and at first I thought that the gold-seekers had come in search of me, but a single glance at the darkness some distance ahead, I ascertain as to who the strangers could be. I quickly extinguished my torch, and crept forward to get a view of the intruders, whoever they might be.

I moved forward, keeping in the shadow of the wall, and had a view of a large chamber, rudely furnished. In one corner a fire was kindled, and near it sat two evil-looking men of Mexican appearance. They were conversing in a spirited manner, punctuating their sentences with frequent draughts from a large black bottle.

"I tell you what, Jake," said one of the men, "this is about the slickest piece of business we have done since we cracked the dago store in Aspen."

"So it is," replied the one called Jake. "How lucky it was that we got away with the swag without any suspicion of the cove asleep! I say, Mac, we ought to indulge in a regular jubilee when we get back to Blue Rock."

"We will do that all right," said Mac.

Just take another look at these fellers. It does my eyes good to give them a squint.

With this he took up two heavy bags from the cavern floor and poured out the contents. I started in amazement as I saw the long, fat, unmistakably recognized them as the ones belonging to Jim and me, and the same that had been taken from the head of our bed the night before. I was dazed. The thought came to me like a flash. Had he been murdered and carried away by the two robbers while he slept, while I lay all unconscious of what was going on?

"Them are beauties, and no mistake," said Jake, taking up one of the largest nuggets and holding it in the light of the fire. "I'll tell you, Mac, we are in for a streak of luck, if we don't make a mistake. That plan of ours was a daisy. How much better it was to knock one of the coves in the head while he was asleep and tumble his body down in the ravine, and run away with the swag without bothering the other, than it would have been to knock 'em both over. The one that's left, as soon as he wakes, will miss the gold and his partner, and it won't take him long to come to the notion that the other has skipped out with the stuff. That will throw all suspicion off from us and save us the trouble of committing what the newspapers call a 'terrible murder.'"

As I listened to the words a full realization of the dreadful business came to me. Poor Jim had been murdered then while I slept, and the gold taken, and his body thrown into some deep ravine, to become the food of the mountain vultures. And the thought that I had suspected him of dishonesty gave me a keen pang of remorse.

I clutched my heavy forty-five revolver in my hand, feeling that I would be more than justified in sending bullets through the brains of the remorseless villains.

"I say, Mac," went on the one called Jake, "suppose we do this stuff and take a turn down the gulch and knock over a deer. I am as hungry as a wolf, and our larder is about empty."

"That will suit me to a T," responded the other, and, securing the bags of gold in a corner of the cavern, they came in the direction of where I stood. It was plain that my presence would be discovered, and the killing full well what that would mean to me, I stepped back into a niche in the rocks, clutching my revolver for instant use.

I had no plan in view. So sudden had been the turn of affairs, but as they came near I leaped quickly from my place of concealment, and with a quick, heavy blow, sent one of the villains to the floor of the cavern. He had been a log of wood. Then before the other could realize what was taking place I leaped upon him, dealing him a blow with my pistol that sent him down in a senseless heap on the rocky floor.

It was the work of but a few moments to securely bind the two. Then, as I disarmed them, I heard a step in the passage, and turning, I found face to face with Jim Parsons. In a moment I was at his side, and throwing my arms about him, told him of all that had passed since his departure, and begging his forgiveness for the unjust suspicions that had at first assailed me when I discovered his absence.

"What else could you have thought under the circumstances?" he said with his old-time smile, pressing my hand warmly. "But fortune is still on our side, old boy," he added, glancing at the two robbers on the floor of the cavern. And then he went on to relate how he had been aroused in the night by some one bending over him, and, before he could move, was knocked senseless. When he recovered his consciousness he was lying in a deep ravine, covered with blood. He managed to crawl to a stream near by, and, after drinking and bathing his wounds, felt much stronger. He then resolved to the camp, to find me gone. Not knowing whether I was dead or alive, he set out at once for Blue Rock, with the intention of returning with a posse of men, but as he was descending the slope of the hills he saw me entering the valley, and, arriving at the spot, tracked me into the cavern where we met.

As you may well suppose, we were overjoyed at the happy ending of our adventures, and an hour later, the robbers being sufficiently recovered from the blows given them to start on the journey, we set out for Blue Rock, along, as well as the precious nuggets that had come so near costing us our lives.

On reaching Blue Rock we turned over the robbers to the proper authorities, and a few days later started to our homes in the East, feeling that we had had enough of the life of a gold prospector, yet, as we thought of the precious nuggets in our possession, we had no cause to complain.

Colored Snow.

Storms in which red, yellow and orange colored snows fell were recorded as long ago as the sixth century. Pliny mentions a storm in which once occurred in Palermo, in which every hailstone was said to be composed of frozen blood. On March 14, 1813, there was a hailstorm in Tuscany in which the individual stones were each of a bright yellow color. In 1808 at Carniola, Germany, they had a fall of crimson snow which was nearly five feet in depth. Snow of a similar color fell in Italy in 1416, and in the Tyrol in 1847. In some sections of Ireland snow seldom falls to any considerable depth without being composed of alternate layers of frozen rain of three different colors. Sir John Ross mentions Arctic banks of red snow which are so well known to explorers that they are called the "crimson cliffs."

An Angling Fish.

The angler fish angles for his prey from the upper part of his head projects two long tentacles, with fleshy extremities, which wave about in the water and attract small fish, that, approaching and attempting to seize the small bait, are themselves captured by the angler.

DANGER OF HAVING A DOUBLE.

Narrow Escape of an Innocent Man from Conviction for Felony.

From the Washington Star: It is sometimes very unpleasant and even dangerous to look like another person. A friend of mine was big engaged in the practice of law told me of a singular instance where too strange a resemblance got a client into trouble. A young man was arrested, charged with burglary. He had been surprised while in the sleeping room of the head of the family, and had escaped by jumping through a window. He was pursued, but got away. Two hours later my friend's client, a stranger in the town, was arrested. The man and his wife, who saw him, positively identified the young man as did those who joined in the pursuit. To his attorney he persisted in protesting his innocence, but could not account for himself at the time the offense was committed, except by saying he took a long walk to see the city. The attorney who at first believed it excellent to be guilty, looked up his record and became convinced that the young man was innocent, but his conviction seemed a foregone conclusion. One day the lawyer met a man on the street whom he mistook for his client.

"Why, how did you obtain bond?" he asked.

"You are evidently taking me for someone else," was the answer.

A bright idea struck the lawyer. The stranger looked enough he was in hard luck, and a proposition to sit in the court room during the trial was accepted. The lawyer concealed the stranger until the case was called, then he had the real prisoner sit behind him where he could not be seen, the accused being small and my friend quite large. The stranger was seated in the prisoner's dock. Every man identified the man most positively, and the prosecuting attorney looked most satisfied until the supposed prisoner was placed upon the stand, and it was shown that he was not the defendant. Subsequently a convicted burglar made a confession and assigned the privilege of the one with which he got off. Needless to say the double had been charged.

ILLUMINATE THEIR NESTS.

Sagacious Birds' Method of Protecting Their Young from the Bats.

From the New York Journal: The rocky head of Cape Comorin, at the southern extremity of India, seems to stand out over the water like a projecting roof, and under the caves of this roof the reculent swallows build their nests. These nests of the sagacious little birds, who are sometimes called "Japanese nuns" or African finches, are not safe from the depredations of men even in this seclusion, though the mode of collecting them is attended with great danger. The nests are formed in the shape of watch pockets, but authorities differ as to their substance. Some say they are entirely formed of tiny sea plants; others of some molluscous animal, and still others say that they are made of inspissated sea foam, or fishes' spawn. The nests are cemented to a gluttinous secretion possessed by the swallow, and consist of two rooms, they form a much prized article of food in China, where they are shipped in large quantities from India and the neighboring islands. They are white and clean, and when boiled to a jelly have a glutinous taste, which is rather insipid to one who has not a Chinese palate.

At night the hundreds of pendulous nests under the head of Cape Comorin present a strange sight. Sometimes each nest is adorned by a number of fireflies, which the wise birds procure to protect their young from the raids of the murderous bats. They exhibit the trick of sticky clay on the nests fastened to the top of their nests, and then place them on the clay. This arrangement does not contribute to the comfort of the fireflies, but light was necessary, they also forth dazzles the eyes of the flitting bats, and so preserves the lives of the young birds.

As Good as the Medicine.

A physician of Pocahontas county, Virginia, tells a story of a patient, who one night recently swallowed two 32-caliber cartridges in mistake for two certain capsules of his medicine. The doctor left the capsules with the instructions that the sick man should take them during the night. The man swallowed, reached for the capsules, and somehow got hold of the cartridges and did not discover his mistake until he had swallowed them. No serious harm was done, though the patient is dead enough time for some hours.

The Upper Ten.

The strength of the common house ant is something phenomenal. Sir John Lubbock has estimated that one of these ants sustain a weight down times greater than its own. This is equivalent to a man hoisting six tons by his teeth.

The Largest Camellia.

Perhaps the largest camellia in existence is at Plintitz castle, near Dresden, Germany. The tree is twenty-four feet high and annually produces about 50,000 blossoms.

this you will know that this medicine is composed of the active principles of roots and herbs, which are known to be a great aid to nature in all her menstrual qualities.

It acts on expectorant, a tonic, sudorific, and a mild laxative. In fact, it is a medicine that renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It relaxes the constricted air cells and clears the lungs of the phlegm or mucous, changes the secretions and purifies the blood, heals the irritated parts, gives strength to the digestive organs, and by its tonic effect on the nerves and muscles, strengthens the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect that it will relieve the most distressing Cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted by every entire satisfaction in the most obstinate case of consumption. It is warranted to contain no opium in any form and will not act on the head to produce headache. It is guaranteed to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is effective and powerful enough for relief of the old person.
