CHAPTER XXIII.

As she lay on her bed, she thought of the night Marga had read the closely written above her head, and she felt the

CHAPTER XXIV.

The doctor's face was pale as he looked at the woman who lay motionless on the bed. He had seen many such cases, but never before. The woman's eyes were closed, and her breathing was faint. He knew she was dying, but he did not know how long she would live. He tried to revive her, but it was in vain.

CHAPTER XXV.

There was a great silence in the room. The doctor had gone, and the woman was still lying on the bed. The family stood around her, their faces pale with grief. They had tried to revive her, but she would not wake. The doctor had said she would live, but now she was dead. They felt a great loss, and they knew that they would never see her again.

CHAPTER XXVI.

The sun shone brightly on the water. The boat was moving slowly down the river.
The water was calm, and the trees on the banks were green. It was a beautiful day, and the people on the boat were enjoying it. They had come here for a picnic, and they were having a good time.
The boatman was a friendly man, and he was taking them to a beautiful spot.

CHAPTER XXVII.

The woman was lying on the bed, and she was looking at the ceiling. She had been thinking about the night Marga had read the letter to her. She felt that she had made a mistake, and she knew that she would never see Marga again. She felt sad, and she knew that she was dying. She wanted to see Marga one more time, but she knew that it was impossible.
