

ously, and one morning she suddenly seized his hand, and with an arch smile, she drew him to the window, and looking out thoughtfully into the sunny garden...

CHAPTER XXV.—Continued. "I'll tell you all about it, and indeed, it was the old man's heart which was so warm in the talk of it. You remember the terrible night? You remember the talk of it? I want say a word more than I can say, it makes me shiver myself. I've never seen a man so generous in death, as he was in life...

CHAPTER XXVI. "OH! old Jeanne! what a sudden weakness that came over her! She fell back as if she had been struck by lightning. The tears came pouring down her cheeks, and his voice broke down into sobs...

"I see you are still mystified, but what does the lady say herself?" and he touched the hand of Lady Felicie. "She said, 'I am not a ghost, I am a woman, and I have a right to be treated as such...'
