

"But I am in earnest" protested...

"So am I!" said the dame with the blue-black eyes...

"I don't think papa would care for so permanent a change of true love, if I ever am married."

"It is the golden cross I gave, years ago, to Bessie Raven," cried he.

"Yes," she said, quietly, "and I am Bessie Raven."

"You?" "Yes, my mother died shortly after you gave me this. My uncle, who had just returned from the West..."

"And really, my dear child, you are not my mother's daughter, but my father's."

"You little thief!" cried he, "you must have stolen it!"

"Bessie stood silent and silent, her feet cast down, her bare feet impatiently patting the velvet gown."

"YOU LITTLE THIEF!" "You could not justify it—she scorned."

"Bessie," said the boy, "what made you do it? You don't know that it is wrong to steal?"

"Wrong?" cried Bessie, passionately. "Why is it wrong? You are rich and I'm poor! You've got everything, and I've got nothing!"

"Felix Enfield looked at her. Verily there was more in her creed than had he realized."
