LITTLE INSECT PESTS ARE THE ENEMY OF COTTON HOUSE PLANTS

The arch enemy of the window gardener is the insect pest. They spoil a plant's growth and lower its vitality until it either dies outright or ceases to bloom or make a worthwhile plant. Probably not one woman in twenty takes her plants through a winter without having them attacked sooner or later by insects. One in the spot least susceptible to them, however, like the house plant, is the one most likely to be attacked.

The most common and most annoying of these pests are the mealybugs, aphids, scale insects, and spider mites. They are all found on indoor plants, and they are all equally destructive. They feed on the plant's sap, and they excrete a sticky substance which clogs the plant's pores and prevents it from taking in food and water. They also excrete a substance which is highly poisonous to the plant.

The most effective way of getting rid of these pests is to use a good insecticide. There are many different kinds of insecticides on the market, and it is important to choose one that is safe for the plant and effective against the pest. It is also important to use the insecticide correctly, according to the directions on the label.

has been designed. Rinse the top well with clean water and return to the window. If a thorough job has been done there will be no more trouble, but the plant should be examined again in a couple of days and if need be the treatment repeated.

Scale insects stick to the back of leaves as though they were glued there. They often form a waxy, protective covering over themselves. To get rid of them, wash the plant with a strong solution of soap and water. Be sure to get the insects off the back of the leaves.

Spider mites are very small and they are very numerous. They feed on the plant's sap and they excrete a substance which is highly poisonous to the plant. They are most common on indoor plants, and they are most destructive. They are most easily killed by a strong solution of soap and water.
