

Forsaking all Others

By AMELIA DUGHENIN

CHAPTER VI (Continued)

She followed his movements with yearning eyes, and unconsciously influenced by her imploring thoughts, he half desisted as he came near. Quick as a dart Helen glanced up, she saw the pale woman looking at him with forward and naive, flushed in crest triumph. The next moment her voice rang out in a way, halting, but so sweet and fragrant, that he turned and looked at her in a way that made her heart beat fast. He was looking at her in a way that made her heart beat fast. He was looking at her in a way that made her heart beat fast.

CHAPTER VII

It was perhaps the most beautiful day for Helen's victory that in the morning she had seen her mother. Her mother, who had been so long away, was now back in the city. Helen, who had been so long away, was now back in the city. Helen, who had been so long away, was now back in the city.

TRANSVAAL WAR ITEMS.

Phoebe, summoned her to her room. His answer was a curt note.

"When you have sent for my wife and apologized for the insult offered to her and her sisters I will see you again - not later. Meanwhile, it is only fair to warn you that I shall resist any interference with Mrs. Altheimer's plans, through a third party, when she has decided that she is serving your interests and ours in the course she is pursuing."
