BIRMINGHAM, FRIDAY, APRIL 13.

Mark Twain has decided to quit living in England. Over there, before laughing at Mark's jokes just because he tells them, they insist on first finding out what there is to laugh at.

"Have you heard much laughter from London?" asks Oom Paul in substance. No, nor yet from Pretoria. It might, however, be well to watch the face of Cecil Rhodes and harken to the noises that come from his direction.

The postoffice at Ponce, Porto Rico, has been opened. The people in Porto Rico get their first concrete illustration of American methods. They have been so busy watching the various noises that they failed to keep an eye on the postoffice.

This is a most deplorable condition of affairs on the heels of the celebration of the Prince of Peace's birthday. But there is one consolation connected with the matter, and that pertains to the [illegible] fact that nations that pretend to be Christian [illegible] are the [illegible] nations.
