A CHANGE OF HEART.

"It is asking too much of a chap. I don't wish to appear unreasonable, but good gracious, March, do you think I went to lose the result of two months' constantly faithful and reliable work?"

Cyril Lawnsdale stood in the back of the dim, deserted stage and mopped his glowing forehead. "I've a great mind to throw over the whole thing."

"You can't do that, Mr. Lawnsdale. You know your contract is to play this piece all summer," Mr. March, the stage manager, looked annoyed and worried.

"Yes, but I never expected to play it with a stage-struck baby, a girl separated by half of the schedule. It is outrageous to even imagine that she could take Miss Northrup's place."

"She got through the rehearsal fairly well and she's proven a credit."

Mr. March took up a seat on the stage and Mr. Lawnsdale glared at him in reply.

"If he has taken too much advantage of the stage and now I must either leave or play with a girl who will not do my job," Mr. March said to himself.

At length he decided to sit down and write a letter to her parents, and when she came to tell him of her doubts and fears in the bosom of the whole play would be left to him to do.

When the curtain fell, the lights were thrown on the floor and the scene was set for the first night to be back and leave in the land."

Heaven only knows why he has had a nice career for twenty years and the way of a leading lady is still before my completion."

Cyril turned away, he saw that it was late to say anything more. He left the theater and started to walk off if possible, his nervous dread of the evening performance. He had never much in his mind, but he had thought the work over, thinking that a thoughtfully chosen letter, written in the quiet of the night, would do the trick. And now here he stands, with the lights on, and he is to play the part of a man who has broken his heart over a girl who is to be the center of the play. He is to be the man who is to be the center of the play.

When he saw that the lights were on, he turned and looked at the stage. He saw that the lights were on, and he was to play the part of a man who has broken his heart over a girl who is to be the center of the play.

THE DISTANCE OF THE STARS.

A Problem in Which Astronomers Are Much Interested.

A problem in which the astronomers are now much interested is the vast distance of the stars, especially those far out in the Milky Way.

It was formerly thought that the brightest stars were the nearest, and the faintest the most distant. But it is now found that this is not the whole truth, and that some of the brightest stars are far away, and some of the faintest are very near.

There are two remarkable cases of this kind. Canopus in the constellation of the ship's keel, is the brightest star in the sky. Its distance is measured as 460 light years, which is about 150,000,000,000,000 miles. Another star, Alpha Centauri, is the nearest to us, and its distance is measured as 4.2 light years, which is about 40,000,000,000,000 miles.
