The Price of Beef.

It is to be hoped that the average farmer will not be "carried away" by the sensational prices paid for fat cattle at the close of the International Live-Stock Show. It should be understood that when Advance, the grand champion steer of Aberdeen-Angus blood, sold for $1.50 per pound on foot at auction that was the result of competition between rival buyers from New York, Pittsburg and Chicago, and the sale at the figure mentioned may be considered purely of an advertising nature. The meat could not possibly reimburse the buyer for the outlay, but it will no doubt pay him to have the notoriety consequent upon the sensational purchase.

The sale of the Kerrick steers for $15 per hundred weight after they had won the championship prize in the exhibition of carload lots of cattle was another proud achievement of the breeders of Aberdeen-Angus cattle, and this fact may be taken as perfectly legitimate in that the meat will sell at a profit even at the fine figure quoted.

Both sales however go to show what can be done with cattle bred and fed for beef of the highest possible quality. It would be difficult to improve a more perfect animal than Advance and the Kerrick steers were also of very high class. The general farmer should learn from the excellence of these animals, from their perfection of contour and even distribution of mellow flesh upon the best portions of the body that in order to raise such stock it is absolutely necessary to have the right kind of blood to start with and then to feed in a proper manner. Such animals as these do not simply grow up with any kind of care. The molds must be carefully chosen, a bull of impressive stamp must be use upon the right sort of heifers and after the progeny arrives it must be fed from the first moment until the last with the utmost object of producing the most and best beef in the hottest possible time. This is not a job for scrubs. The prime steer cannot be produced at the same cost as the animal which struggles through and is sold at three or four years of age, yet when everything is taken into account there is not a very great deal of difference when it is demonstrated that the scrub animal requires but a little more feed for the feed it has consumed and the time it has required to raise it. It may be stated upon general principles that any man who owns a productive farm and is possessed of ordinary intelligence can produce steers that will bring a good price at the Christmas market time if he will do away with the scrub cows upon his farm and in their place keep high-grade females and a bull of one or other of the beef breeds. It would even be possible to create a herd of beef cattle commencing with the original scrub blood, but this is a slow and unsatisfactory process and we would not advise our readers to try it. After a start has been made the calves should be fed from the first when suckling their dams and early accustomed to eating meals and ground oil cake if it can be had at fairly cheap prices.

The pregnant cow must also be generously fed so as to give the calf a good start, for the first steps towards early maturity are of a certainty made in the womb. If the calf should come into the world stunted and the cow from lack of perfectly feeding should have poor milk or a deficiency in flow of milk it will be impossible to make up the loss later on, just as it is also true that calf flesh lost cannot well be replaced by subsequent good feeding. It is, in short, necessary to breed right, feed right and fit right to reap the fine [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] exposition.

Inoculated and Uninoculated Soils.

A German author, A. Caron, spent considerable time investigating the effect of inoculating soils with nitrogen-consuming bacteria. An estimation was made of the abundance of bacteria in various soils that had been cropped with oats, barley and rye, following wheat, rye and wheat. There were found 1.5, 2.2 and 2.7 million bacteria per cubic centimeter in the three soils. It was also found that in black fallow, a fallow on which grass had been allowed to grow prior to plowing under, the number of bacteria increases from spring until autumn, when their maximum number is to be found.

Investigations were conducted to ascertain the vertical distribution of soil bacteria, and it was found that they decrease with the increased depth of the soil from which they are taken, there being six million per cubic centimeters at a depth of eight inches and only one and a half million at a depth of 12 inches, in this field examined.

Examinations were made of a field in which various crops, such as grain clover, potatoes, etc., had been grown and it was found that where grains were grown there was a decrease in the number of soil bacteria as the season advanced, while there was a constant increase in the case of the other crops. In this the author confirms the observations of others that grain crops do best when they follow such crops as clover, potatoes, etc., or fallow, not only on account of the chemical and physical condition of the soil, but also on account of the presence of greater numbers of soil bacteria by the aid of which greater amounts of nitrogen are supplied to the growing crop.

The author isolated the bacteria from soils on which wheat and clover had been grown, and also from compost making numerous pure cultures of them. For experiments were made to test their influence upon the growth of oats. The pots were of centimeters of a bouillon culture, and all received the same fertilizers and treatment. At maturity the plants grown in the spots receiving the bacterial cultures gave as an average 18.45 gm. grain and 29.9 gm. straw, as compared with 13.26 and 22.14 gm. from the check pots.

In 1899 some field experiments were undertaken with oats in which the seed, prior to sowing, was impregnated with the cited organism by soaking for some time in liquid cultures containing it. The yields of grain from inoculated seed and from seed so treated were in the proportion of 100 to 135. In the autumn the field where the oats had been sown was plowed and in the spring sown with mustard. The yields of green forage on equal portions of uninoculated and inoculated plants may be represented by the proportion of 100 to 195.

Numerous additional experiments were conducted which in every case gave a higher yield whenever the soil or seed had received an inoculation with some form of soil bacteria.

REAL SPECIAL SALES

Real special sales are somewhat of a novelty here and everywhere. That is, if "special sale" can be construed as offering goods for less than their full worth. Dealers who insist resort to continuous advertising of bargains, are pretty certain to handle merchandise of doubtful value. The success of our business has been won by selling regular goods in regular assortment at the lowest regular prices such things can be sold for. Exceptions to this rule have been made only when we consummated specially advantageous purchases of merchandise of undoubted quality and highest form of desirability, or when we cut prices at the end of a selling season, as in this instance

NOTES FOR WOMEN.

Collected for The Eccentric.

An effort is being made all over our country by out-of-door art societies, by women's clubs, and by our leading magazines to do away with the advertising that is disfiguring our towns, villages and even country ways. Just contrast the pleasing effect of clean telegraph and telephone poles in our own little village as compared with those of our sister towns. This work has been done by our Village Improvement Society and in this work the society have had help from our best people—men and women, boys and girls.

A few days ago in Reading, Pa., an impromptu broom brigade of women formed and a lesson in street cleaning given.

The D. of M. holds a self-washup at the Chicago Commons. This year it was given by Miss Edith Clark, who has made a study of the juvenile court.

The Woman's National Suffrage Bazar netted over $7,000.

The women of Boston registered by thousands and voted on electing five out of eight candidates indorsed by them, two of whom were women.

The mayors of many of our large cities have recently come to see that woman's help is needed in municipal affairs. The mayor of Minneapolis says: "We owe more to the character of our women than to any other factor in the progress of our city.

Out of 60 universities and colleges of highest standing in this country only nine refuse degrees to women. Princeton is the only university in the United States that refuses to confer honors upon women.

Money in Sugar Beet Raising.

The Mason City (Iowa) Republican gives the experience of Mr. Henry Hale, near Emery, in that State. He planted one and a half acres in sugar beets. The expense was: Seed, $6; one day plowing, with team, $2.50; half day harrowing, with team, $1.25; half day planting, with team, $1.25; five days hoeing and weeding, one man, $7.50; boy, five days at 45 cents, $2.25; three men, four days pulling beets, $18; two teams, one and a half days hauling to cars, at $2.50, $7.50; making a total of $46.25. But $25.75 of this was for his own labor and that of his team. He raised 22 tons of sugar beets and sold them for $77, thus realizing $50.50 from his acre and a half of sugar beets. Several growers of the Detroit Sugar Company have done better than this. These figures speak for themselves. Our agricultural readers should obtain contracts from the Detroit Sugar Company, at Rochester, before it is too late.
