Saving Apples.

This is a subject upon which few think alike. The fundamental question, "is storing profitable," can be answered in as many ways as there are lots to store. My own opinion is, that is the years go by storing will increase, but profits thereby will decrease. The mere fact of so many cold storage houses being available will tend to make apples worth more money in the fall or at picking time and less in the spring. This will no doubt be a good thing for the producer if not for the storer of apples. It is to be hoped that more discrimination will be shown in the matter of storage of apples. Too many poor apples are stored, and the knowledge of this is taken advantage of by certain cold storage men to the disadvantage of the holders.

Cold storage used with judgment is one of the best aids of the fruit grower and dealer, but used as it often is for storing bruised or windfall or poorly packed fruit it is worse than useless, a detriment. In general put no apples in cold storage unless intended for temporary holding and only certain varieties that would keep fairly well in ordinary storage. An apple which would be all right in a cellar in the month of January will be mealy and tasteless if stored in cold storage and a tempest in a tea pot will keep a Baldwin or Ben Davis for months with sometimes quite a Duchess as a type. Show apples as effectual as a work of fiction for weather. The lack of variation in the treatment of different varieties of apples and even of the same varieties under different conditions will explain many a puzzling lack of keeping quality in apples and storage. Cold storage is as yet only in its infancy and there is no doubt in my mind that the time will come, and is not so very far distant, when almost any apples properly picked and packed can be kept from one to two years in perfect condition and without shrinkage.

The problem of liquified air will no doubt be an important one and electricity is already in use in one place in Chicago. The cooling agent in most common use is ammonia but carbonic acid gas is now being tested with good results, and its freedom from odor and from danger in case of fire, may make it a formidable rival of ammonia. It also is in use in one Chicago plant in connection with electricity and is doing good work. Benjamin Newhall.

Spreading Manure Upon the Snow.

An early and heavy snow fall, while tending to diminish natural losses of plant food, is apt to favor artificial losses. It is apt to deter the farmer from hauling out his manure supply for many days and lead to the mistaken notion that spreading manure upon the snow is a wonderful practice. But much of its value is lost by leaching and by running off of the surface in the spring. They point to darkened snows, to discolored furrows and to greener meadows at the base of the hillsides as proof of these losses. It is probably true that some loss occurs at this way, but the loss that is usually supposed. Those who are frightened by this, however, should study the farm losses, should know that as ordinarily kept manure deteriorates more in the farm cellar or in the manure heap than it does in the field. The fact is it is more profitable to leach in the soil it is meant to fertilize than in proximity to the barn and the family well; that it will ferment less outdoors than it will indoors; that, in short, experiment and experience alike show that the housing of manure upon the winter for spring hauling is seldom better and generally worse than spreading it upon the snow as fast as it is made. Some will be lost if spread in winter, but more will be lost if kept at the barn, and the spring's work will be just so much the further behind.

Experiment station bulletins, press the doctrine, institute speakers proclaim it, and farmers are yearly practicing it more extensively. It is the modern notion, and the right one. That winter manuring of a steep sidehill may not be advisable, but moderate slopes or level pieces of not too leachy land may be easily fertilized any day (except Sunday).—Vermont Experiment Station Bulletin.

Value of Foods.

The animal must have a certain amount of feed to produce heat and energy, and this can be more cheaply secured from carbohydrates. Protein is necessary to replace tissue waste, the body, to form flesh and to enable milk-producing animals to give maximum and continuous milk yields. Special use of carbohydrates. The carbohydrates, being the principal source of heat and energy, serve as the chief source of fat.

Special use of fat. Experiments have proved that fat yields two and one-half times as much heat as the carbohydrate. Animal fat is formed from the fat of the feed, but as a rule not directly. I. e. the fat molecule is more or less pulled to pieces and reconstructed. The lives of none of our farm animals can be sustained by the use of carbohydrates or ash alone, and yet protein, carbohydrates and ash of the feed are all absolutely necessary to sustain life and produce growth. Experiments proving the above facts teach us that for the securing of specific ends, such as the production of flesh, fat or milk, these several groups of substances as found in our various agricultural plants should not for economical reasons be fed hap-hazard, but rather in reasonably definite proportions, depending upon the end sought.

Cattle Too Poor to Ship.

The cattle of Arizona are so poor on account of the short pasturage caused by drought that the Southern Pacific, it is reported, has issued an order that cattle from Arizona destined to points in Texas on the Texas & Pacific road, cannot be accepted for through shipments, because the T. & P. refuses to take the cattle, owing to their poor condition. The order recommends that shippers prepay to El Paso, locally, and that the shippers there make their arrangements with the officers of the T. & P. for further shipments. This order practically suspends shipments by this route from Arizona. The recent rains have done much good, and it is said that cattle are rapidly recovering with plenty of green grass and a good outlook for winter feed.
