Big Vessel Sinks and 128 Persons Drown.

CONSUL WILDMAN IS LOST.

The Steamship City of Rio de Janeiro Strikes Upon Mile Rock in a Fog, Backs Off and Settles Down—Struggle for Life Boats.

The Pacific Mail company's steamship City of Rio de Janeiro, while entering the San Francisco harbor from the orient during a heavy fog Friday morning, struck a sunken rock and went down in about fifteen minutes in thirty fathoms of water off Fort Point.

A record list of the dead shows that 128 persons were lost. Capt. William Ward, the ship's master, and all the officers of the Pacific Mail Company, went down with his ship. There were 200 persons on board. Of all the dead only two of the ships boats ever reached the shore. One of these had a dead fireman in charge. What the other two boats carried or were doing is unknown. Those rescued by the pilot-boat Arcata were picked up from the floating ship before they got clear.

Roused from sleep in their cabin as the first gray of daylight stole into the condemning fog, Postmaster Wildman and his wife, Consul Wildman, Mrs. Wildman's sister, Miss Kinney, and several other passengers were hurried on deck. Mrs. Wildman was clad in her night clothes, and her husband had only had time to throw a coat over his shoulders. Mrs. Wildman was close to the pilot, carrying Dorothy, two years old.

"We'll follow you," shouted Jordan. "The boy's all right."

Mrs. Wildman started down the gangway, the others following closely. She got to the fourth step, and the survivors can tell no more of the Wildman family.

The decks were split and forced up just as though there had been a great explosion," is Nusserblatt's story. "The boats plunged down and stern heaved upward, the ship surged over on the side toward the small boat and we all went down into the sea. I hardly know what happened except that I had the sensation of being carried a long ways down under the water, and when I found I was going upward again I thought I could not survive to reach the surface. But I finally got to air and found a plank, on which I floated until I was picked up an hour and three-quarters later."

Nusserblatt saw nothing of the Wildmans after his return to the surface.

Risky Investment in Coffee Raising.

With a great flourish of trumpets and the colonial office announces a few years since that cannibalists at Hanover, Germany, had decided to take up on a large scale the coffee culture in the Usambara district of German East Africa, a section which it was asserted by experts was particularly well adapted to such an enterprise. What the cannibals at Hanover thought of the matter has never been recorded, but the fact remains that the coffee culture in Usambara has proved a failure.

Licorice Business Is Profitable.

In the southern Caucasus large tracts of land are covered by the licorice plant. A Scotch gentleman who visited this country from Constantinople had his attention drawn to this potential source of wealth, and erected a factory on the spot for the distillation of the licorice juice. The erection of similar factories quickly followed, so that now a large export trade is carried on in this product, and the peasantry of the district find a remunerative occupation in the gathering and sale of the root to these establishments.

Splendid Carriage for Wilhelmina.

The marriage fabric of the queen of the Netherlands was kept for several days on exhibition on the premises of a carriage builder in the Boulevard Haussmann in Paris. It was sent thither to be relined. It is painted in cream color, Vernis Martin, of great purity of tint, the box seat, the springs and the hubs of the wheels are of a rich orange; the new linings are of white brocade and the queen had eight white horses, with orange colored trappings, to take her to church on her wedding day.

Contribution to "Countess Fund."

The West Chester and Philadelphia Street Railroad company a few days ago received a contribution to its conscience fund, accompanied by this letter: "Sir: Inclosed find a $2 bill to which I did not put in the box. To get right with God you are you right with God? Get ready for the judgment day, not ready, mind, do you hear?" The president of the road intimates that the unknown will be lost have a long time coming if he waits for a car to carry him to the pearly gate.
