THE PAKES OF ARIZONA

A calamity like that which buried Pinal, once led to the plateau dwellers' villages of Arizona. Aided, unaided, stiches of almost countless mesas, now greet the eye where once flourishing towns stood. The ruins left behind are found with difficulty. An almost impenetrable and apparently endless expanse of lava forms a world for the ruined villages. Energetic and enthusiastic men have however, accomplished much, and among them is Cecil A. Deane, custodian of the war relics room in the state house at Denver. Mr. Deane spent many weeks last fall searching the forlorn plateau north of Hahkon for traces of its ancient inhabitants. He brought back with him many objects of absorbing interest which have never been displayed to the public eye and which, in his opinion, have been written in stone. Some of them were in the form of the lives of their departed owners, while others afford only the subjects for wonder and conjecture. In the course of his explorations Mr. Deane found an admirable proof of a catastrophe of volcanic origin, which occurred in the course of a wave of molten lava. Today hard irregular and jagged ridges of lava extend over the site of a city of several thousand inhabitants. The most peculiar habitations of that variety were overgrown by a forest of pines. The most of the pines and the lava have been carried away by the lava flow, leaving only the stumps of the trees and the lava flow.

Mr. Deane's discovery of the lava flow is a most interesting one. It is a most interesting one. It is a most interesting one. It is a most interesting one. It is a most interesting one.
