Pasture and Range for Hogs.

Pasture and range are necessary in order to keep breeding swine in a healthy condition and grow the stock at a profit. The man who tries to raise swine under other conditions is playing a losing game, and his balance will be on the debit side of the ledger just as sure as we have day and night.

Although these facts have been vouchsafed many times by experiment stations and successful swine raisers and given wide publicity, thousands of farmers still continue in trying to raise hogs in a dry lot, with nothing but corn as a feed, with the expectation of making it a profitable operation.

A hog pasture does not mean a dirt lot with possibly a few weeds growing in one corner, but a good and common-sense range, and if planned to give the best results, it will contain a variety of crops selected as to their food value. The pasture should not be so small that the hog is compelled to eat his own filth to get the feed. Every farmer should have a little food range, not only for his hogs, but for his fish and other stock. The range should be fenced properly for this use. This is in addition to what may be utilized outside at times. Better far to have a little food range, not only for his hogs, but for his fish and other stock. The range should be fenced properly for this use.
