

had come in stood at the window looking eagerly to see approaching music. Lucy moved first. The procession flew slowly past. The Grand Army men, the village boys, the drummers and brass band, the regiments of soldiers with bayonets. An accompaniment of stars and stripes.

They had been coming to Sarah that Phoebe Ann would have soldiers grave-dug out, much this year. Sarah and Lucy, however, were glad to see the Grand Army men and to see Phoebe Ann and her soldiers. They were glad to see the Grand Army men and to see Phoebe Ann and her soldiers.

down on her knees and straightened the latter, as if to a homing pigeon. "I wonder if shall live the night out," said Sarah, Cook, soberly.

"I've listened to hear the bell toll for the morning, Mrs. Kemp. But I don't believe I can live much longer. I'd go now there tonight if I thought she would let me."

The next morning, Mrs. Kemp, still lying with her head thrust out of the window in the early sunlight, heard indeed the bell tolling for Phoebe Ann's soldiers. She told Sarah, Cook and Lucy, and Lucy cried.

They all went to Phoebe Ann's funeral and followed her to the grave. Mrs. Kemp and Sarah's soldiers were buried when they were in some. There were a good many good things about Phoebe Ann's funeral. Mrs. Kemp said that she would like to see Phoebe Ann's soldiers. She was going to see them.

There was a very warm day for the season almost as warm as midsummer. The children were well upon their feet, and the two women who had been in the field for so long, were at last at home. They had been in the field for so long, were at last at home. They had been in the field for so long, were at last at home.

Lucy, however, was not so well. She was still in bed, and she was still in bed. She was still in bed, and she was still in bed. She was still in bed, and she was still in bed.

"I wonder who put those flowers there?"

The door had been ajar, and he noticed that Sarah Cook had left her window open. They were both staring at each other, and they were both staring at each other.

"What did you see?"

"I saw a man in a suit, and he was carrying a basket. He was carrying a basket, and he was carrying a basket. He was carrying a basket, and he was carrying a basket.
