Reclaiming Money...
There was received at the redemption division of the treasury recently a package containing a mass of greenish paper, dried and hard, but showing evidence of having once been water-soaked. The letter accompanying explained that the substance had once been money, and that it had been found among the debris left by the storm at Galveston, Tex. It was of great interest, because it was undoubtedly the first money to be salvaged from the devastation of that storm, but comparatively little of it had been recovered. A half-ton or more of installments have been received, but it was not until a few hundred dollars' worth of it had been found that the fact that it had been found in the pockets of clothing worn by victims of the storm was known. It was in the case and the condition of the money that it was found in the pockets of clothing worn by victims of the storm was known.
