Sunday Afternoons

From the window of the chapel softly
A soundlis an organ's note,
Through the peaceful Sabbath gloaming
Drifting shreds of music float,
And the quiet and the firelight and the
sweets solemn tunes
Bear me dreaming back to boyhood
and its Sunday afternoons.

When we gathered in the parlor in the parlor stiff and grand,
Where the hair-cloth chairs and sofa
stood all ranged in a solemn band,
Where each picture on the wall was watched as the glad recital began
Of the glory of the stars and the light of the sun and man.

Then the quaint old parlor organ with the quaver in its tongue Seemed to tremble in its fervor as the voices rose and sang
While the fingers grew more deepened and the evening settled down
Till the flame of window candles flickered
in the sombre parlor town.

A Jest of Fate.

BY MAUDE E. LEONARD.

The man was in a brown study. Apparently he was engaged in a difficult experiment in his laboratory, for his hands moved automatically among the chemicals. Liquids met, mingled and were separated deftly, but in reality he was entirely ignorant of what his sensitive fingers were doing, for his mind was busily engaged otherwise.

He was a well-built man, and his profile spoke of strength, with its slightly aquiline nose, deep-set eye, and closely trimmed beard. That the mouth hidden by this same beard held doubtful curves and a curious droop was a fact naturally unknown to most persons. When Dr. Packard chose to address a meeting of scientists his auditors always were aroused and listened. For he had a brain. Whether he was troubled by a heart was something women liked to speculate about. Those who had solved the question discreetly hid their dearly cought knowledge, for women do not parade their hurts.

In the face of this it is somewhat remarkable to understand that at the moment when he was so aimlessly pottering about in his mechanical fashion, with his retrospective mind, Dr. Packard was thinking of a lady entirely unconnected with science. She had come out of the past so far back that the links of memory in ascending to consciousness were broken. Dr. Packard found himself trying to recall her name, her features, her voice, her manner, and he was annoyed at his failure. Why should he remember her? She had been nothing to him, and he had not seen her for years. Why should he remember her? She had been nothing to him, and he had not seen her for years. Why should he remember her? She had been nothing to him, and he had not seen her for years.

The other held poison.

smashed it as he reflected what a fool he had been. At nineteen he had married Bessie Crowell. She was a waitress in the railroad restaurant and alone in the world. She had been pretty, of course, and she was good. As to her spending, he was not so sure. Carefully he pieced out his loyish recollection of her. He knew precisely what her type would have degenerated into in the time which had passed. With the uncompromising accurate knowledge of the inadroite mind he could see her as she undoubtedly was after the lapse of twenty years. She was fat and wore broad flat shoes with the buttons off. Her gowns were of the dreary, nondescript words stupid women affect and her waist went by courtesy. Her hair it had been brown and roughly curly—was thinning and shiny and screwed into a tight knot. Her complexion was coarse and oily, and she was gross, stolid and entirely repellant to a man of fastidious tastes. Her mind had never risen above the gossip of the store and corners. As this picture grew correspondingly faded the idea which as a just man had attacked him, that he had done wrong in running away from her. It was with a sort of pride he recollected in all these years he had never failed to send regular remittances back to her and the child. For there had been one, but it had not appealed to his restless youth and still slumbering emotions of fatherhood. His lawyer relieved him of the delicate task of forwarding the allowance to Bessie. Mrs. Abbott. When he ran away he had changed his name to Packard and she had never traced him, though his insatiable legal man had once carelessly conveyed to him the impression that a vindictive and spasmodic search for her stranded missing husband was now and then made by his client's beneficiary. Mr. Abbott Packard had thanked him. And man gravely without words to any information concerning the whereabouts of husband to be, who had left her and had gone his own way. What he had done with his life was his own affair.

ALL-DAY FIGHT IN BOER WAR

Crabbe's Command Attacked by Kritzinger Near Cradock.

HORSES ARE STAMPEDED.

Train from Cape Town with Supplies Held Up and Burned Near Schreipers —Three Killed and 18 Wounded. Boer Prisoners Escaping.

London, July 25. The British war office has received the following dispatch from Lord Kitchener, dated Pretoria, July 23. French reports that Crabbe with 300 men was attacked in the mountains near Cradock, by Kritzinger at dawn July 21. The horses stampeded. An all-day fight followed. Crabbe fell back on Mortimer. Our loss was slight. A train from Cape Town with 113 men and stores, was held up, captured and burned at Schreipers, eight miles north of Beaufort West, on the morning of July 21. Our casualties were three killed and eighte n wounded. An inquiry is proceeding."

The freedom of the city of London was conferred on Lord Milner of Cape Town, governor of the Transvaal and the Orange River Colony, at the Guildhall today. Lord Milner made a speech in which he deprecated the granting of any concessions that would possibly be compromising by the future or the risk of popularizing the rebellion by treating what he called "criminals tried in court as a political offence."

Boer Prisoners Try to Escape.

Hamilton, Bermuda, July 25. The Boer prisoners of war confined on Darrell's island make almost nightly attempts to avoid the patrolling gunboats Medina and Medway and gain the mainland by swimming. The water between Darrells island and the beach is calm, and all night long the gunboats sweep it with their searchlights. Sharks abound, and the British guard will shoot on suspicion, yet several of the Boers have escaped from their detention camp.

New Ministry Is Completed.

Copenhagen, July 25. The new liberal cabinet organized by Dr. Deuntzer to succeed the De Scheistd cabinet, which resigned July 7, is composed as follows: Premier and minister of foreign affairs, Dr. Deuntzer, minister of finance, Alfred Hage, minister of war, Colonel Madsen, minister of marine, Admiral Jonchc, minister of public instruction, Christensen Stanilli, minister of justice, Alberti, minister of agriculture, Ole Hansen, minister of public works, Sontup, minister of the interior, Emvold Gottschen.

QUESTION ANSWERED.

Consumption still has the largest share of any malidies in the civilized world. Your mothers' and grandmothers never thought of using anything else for Indigestion or Biliousness. Doctors were scarce, and they seldom heard of Appendicitis, Nervous Prostration or Heart Failure, etc. They used August Flower to clean out the system, and stop fermentation of undigested food, regulate the action of the liver, stimulate the nervious and organic action of the system, and that is all they took when feeling dull and had with headache and other aches. You only need a few doses of Green's August Flower, in liquid form, to make you satisfied there is nothing serious the matter with you. Sample bottles at Whitehead & Mitchell's.

It Dazzles the World.

No Discovery in medicine has ever created one quarter of the excitement that has been caused by Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption. It's severest tests have been on hopeless victims of Consumption, Pneumonia, Hemorrhage, Pleurisy and Bronchitis, thousands of whom it has restored to perfect health. For Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Croup, Hay Fever, Hoarseness and Whooping Cough it is the quickest, surest cure in the world. It is sold by Whitehead & Mitchell who guarantee satisfaction or refund money. Large bottles, 50c and $1.

Love and Figures.

That love will find a way through all difficulties is illustrated by the recent experiences of Philander Simon and Bertha Karger, both of Paterson, N. J. Philander had been keeping company with Bertha about two years, when for some unexplained reason his love began to cool. Simultaneously Bertha began to fret and pine away. There had been no actual engagement between them so that a suit could not be brought for breaking the marriage promise, but Bertha's mother, who is not only a woman of expedients but a thrifty soul, decided upon a plan for punishing the fickle Philander. She figured that he had been a sixty hearty dinners at her house, upon the occasions of his Sunday wooings, which at 25 cents each amounted to $15. Besides this in a rash moment she had lent him $10. She accordingly began suit for $25.

Meanwhile Philander, who is also thrifty and a man of expedients, began to do a little figuring on his own side, and promptly came in with a counterclaim for $50.00, which left Mrs. Karger $25.00 in his debt if the claim was allowed. Bertha was gathered in as a witness in the case, and on her testimony Philander was mulcted in the sum of $2.50 in actual expenses over Mrs. Karger. This sum the Philander increased by putting in a claim for his time, charging 50 cents for each Sunday evening's wooing for two years, or $52. In the course of the preparations for the suits Philander and Bertha were thrown into close contact, and encouraged by the artful lawyers on both sides, as well as by thrifty Mrs. Karger, who was supplied by the counterclaims, the flame broke out anew and with greater ardor than before. An actual engagement was effected a day or two before the case came on, and both suits were dropped, and Philander and Bertha are happy, all owing to Philander's skill in figuring.

Dazies Too Much for the Boys

A gray haired alumnus of Columbia on from a western state for the graduating exercises, chatted of the days when he was in Columbia. "There was Prof. Davies——" he began. We fellows used to like him as well as it was possible for a college boy to like a procession of mathematics, the effect it produced upon members of my class, most of among the Greeks and Romans. Davies had a method peculiarly his own. He would write a problem on the blackboard, and then, with his back to the class, would begin explaining it. Within a few minutes he would be deep in the mysteries of the problem, and would forget entirely that he was not alone in the room. Without turning around he would call upon a member of the class to solve the problem. Nothing could be more embarrassing than to be called upon to solve a problem when you have not the slightest idea what it is all about. Davies would wait a few minutes, and then, without turning around, would call upon another member of the class. Then he would call upon another, and another, and another, until he had gone the length of the class. Then he would begin at the other end of the class and call upon the members in the same way. Within an hour Davies had called upon every member of the class, and not one of them had solved the problem. Then he would turn around and say: 'Gentlemen, I am surprised that you have not solved this problem. It is very simple. Mr. Blank, please go to the blackboard and explain it.' Mr. Blank would go to the blackboard and explain it in a few minutes, and Davies would
