CHAPTER XVI (Continued). These resulted in a discovery, for he felt positive that he could see signs of a trap door, no unusual thing in these old Berlin houses which have stood the grime and storm of centuries.

To reach it he utilized a table that stood in a corner, upon the top of which he placed a chair. Eureka! The extempore ladder accomplished all that was expected of it, and when he found a small section of the ceiling actually yielded to his gentle, persuasive pressure, Paul began to believe that he had the game in his hands.

Being a thorough athlete he experienced no trouble in drawing himself up and passing through the opening. Had he possessed his usual vigor, it seemed to be in an apartment of some sort.

While moving forward to find a wall, he halted several times to listen, and thus became fully convinced that there was something or some one in the room with him. This was not pleasant, and he laid his open to attack at any moment.

As though the situation was not interesting enough for Paul, his hands by accident, while groping around, came in contact with some object that had rested upon a small table, and which he touched with his fingers. He employed that the vase toppled over upon the floor with a crash.

It was loud enough to almost arouse the dead. Paul heard the unknown spring erect in surprise and start toward the spot where the table had betrayed the intruder.

Bent upon defending himself, he prepared to receive the party who rashly advanced, but there was no one there.

Suddenly a descending shriek attested that the unknown had struck the object on the open trap had been his most affected point, and he ventured to kiss his face, no doubt, several times as he was passing through.

At least so far as our friend was concerned, he wasted no pity upon the late inmate of the room who had gone into such sudden exile.

ing away, and left him unarmed at the mercy of his foe. Just then, however, Paul was not in a humor to decide whether to call the affair off or pit his meek antagonism as an earnest of victory.

Truth to tell he had about all he wanted to take care of in looking out for himself.

There was about one chance in ten that he might escape as his comrades had done, by beating a hasty retreat over the edge of the ramparts.

Paul was not the man to hesitate and lose valuable time in calculating chances. Accordingly he whirled on his heel, made a duck low to those who had just witnessed his remarkable fight, which compliment surely Frenchmen should appreciate, and then made a bounding break for the edge of the ramparts, intending to throw himself down regardless of minor damage, since it was his one chance for life.

So vast had been the number of troops pressing forward to have a share in the engagement that his way was blocked.

Finding his escape cut off in the direction of the wall, he changed his mind and decided that only a madman or an utterly desperate wretch would continue to advance in that quarter, and his situation did not call for such a needless sacrifice since as a prisoner he would be liberated when the French surrendered.

Again he turned and made a dash in an opposite quarter hardly knowing what lay ahead of him, yet desirous of escaping.

Then his passage was blocked—gunshots threatened him, the shining bayonets being within a foot of his throat.

It was all up, at least so far as escape was concerned, and he was forced to admit this with a groan of disgust. So he dropped the point of his sword to the ground as a sign of surrender, and made no resistance when they disarmed him.

A minute later he regretted his helplessness more than words could tell, for the French officers came and surveyed him with grim contemptuous men, and Paul recognized his old foe, Conrad Hoffman.

THE POPE'S WILL. Document Drawn Up When His Holiness Was in Exile.

It is not generally known that the Pope made a will as long ago as 1837. A copy of the document is before me.

I have my son in the hands of God, and the blessed Mary. I institute as the heirs of my property my dear children, the Pope and his family, equal shares, enjoying upon them the fifty masses said for the benefit of my soul each year for a period of ten years.

When the French opened fire it seemed as though the whole world works blazed with the fury of a Vesuvius.

Chassart and mitrailleuse thundered their bark until it became a mingled roar, and then the French soldiers were above it all could be heard the hollow rattle of the flat Bavarian drums.

Paul the music was a hideous nightmare, but he could appreciate the fact that it served to animate and embolden the Bavarians just as the French thrills the French.

They were now at the foot of the apparently impenetrable fortress. The fatigue was just as furious, but most of the missiles fell around the mark, and they chose to wait, a chance for a breathing spell now offered itself. However, they went up over the walls like the wild chamois of the Swiss Alps, these little Bavarians did.

In the eyes of the amazed Frenchmen they must have appeared like a short of devils hatched out of the infernal fires that blazed all around.

Once in the fortifications they came into hand to hand conflict with the French, and then the forest king of warfare was inaugurated.

Most people think catarrh is a disease confined to the head and throat. It is the most common of all diseases, and is often the cause of the most serious ailments.

Every organ, every duct, every cavity of the human body is liable to catarrh. A multitude of ailments depend on catarrh. This is true in winter and summer.

Catarrh causes many cases of chronic disease, where the victim has no other slight suspicion that catarrh has his experience of Mr. A. C. Lockhart is a case in point.

Mr. A. C. Lockhart, corner Cottage St. and Thurston Road, Rochester, N. Y., writes a letter to Dr. Hartman, saying the following of Peruna:
