CHAPTER XV. (Continued.)

In imagination, Paul could already see the formal character of the order which gave him a footing among the soldiers of the King, and directed him how to reach the front.

He was therefore more surprised than he had been to find that instead of the printed form he had expected, he saw feminine cursive.

"You have not made a mistake," he said, "Surely not. Look on the other side, returned the messenger, eagerly. There was his name beyond a peradventure."

"Herr Paul Rhielandier," "Hotel Royal," "With a feeling of astonishment he again whipped the paper over, and at this time his eye ranged from the "Dear Friend" at the top to the signature at the bottom.

Then it was an electric shock permeated his whole system. "What name was this illegible?" He hesitated for other forgot all about the important order he had been expecting—love takes preference even over the most important things.

When Paul read the contents of the note he was stirred, and for the time being reason gave way to impulse. "Hildegard was in Berlin," he thought, "trouble had come upon her and she needed a friend's advice and assistance—she could presume upon his courtesy to come to her."
