

Of Gladstone's recent writer says: "No Premier in the last 100 years paid less attention to his clothes than did Mr. Gladstone. His hats were particularly shabby, his frock coats of uncertain age and his garments much bagged at the knees with sitting at a desk. This disregard, however, extended only to periods when he was out of office. When in Downing street he dressed almost smartly for a man of his age. How many years' service Mr. Gladstone extracted from his famous liver as a minister of state is generally agreed upon by those who saw him with his head covered."

While aware, it is possible that Turner had not done as he should have done or had done it only in part. He had done it in a measure, a disturbing measure of this impression him. He engaged with the best possible grace to handle such thoughts.

Now, Brown, by the way, was thirty-nine years of age when he married. He was frequently well paid to give his opinions as to the state of matrimonial affairs.

Have Good Things. "An amuse ALLEN'S FOOT-EASE, can truly say I would not have been without it for long, had I known the relief it would give for my aching feet."

When he came to her home she had come out at any rate so the servant told her. He insisted upon being admitted, but it was of no avail. Later, when he again called the same story.

When it was seen that Turner was not a man of sudden fancies and domineering impulses, she felt that the weeks that seemed to her months, so filled were they with trying incidents, were hardly necessary in the matter of his education.
