A LOVE STORY BY AMELIA E. BARR

(Copyright, 1906, by Amelia E. Barr)

A short time after Cornea came home, Doctor Moran returned from his professional visits. Nature had left the impress of her nobility on his finely formed forehead; nothing but truth and kindness looked from his candid eyes. On entering the room, he drew his wife close to his heart and kissed her affectionately. "I have had a morning full of feeling. There is no familiarity with death, however often you meet him. "And you have met death this morning, I see that, John." "You are right, Ava. I must now tell you that Elder Sempie did this morning."

York and Hyde went into the Continental army and did great things. I suppose, for we all know, he was made a general. And will you please only try to imagine it of Mrs. General Hyde? A woman so lofty? So calm! Will you imagine her as Katherine Van Heemskirk in a short, quiet petticoat, with her hair hanging in two braids down her back, running away at midnight with Gen. Hyde? "He was her husband. She committed no fault." "Cornelia, shall I tell you why you are working so close to the window this afternoon?" "You are going to say something I would rather not hear, Arenta."

"The dear old man! He has been sick and sorrowful ever since his wife died. Were any of his sons present?" "None of them. The two eldest have been long away. Ned was obliged to leave New York when the Act forbidding Tory lawyers to practice was passed. But he was not quite alone, his old friend, Joris Van Heemskirk was with him to the last moment. The love of these old men for each other was a very beautiful thing."

"There is nothing to fear in such a death." "Nothing at all. Last week when Cornea and I passed his house, he was leaning on the garden gate, and he spoke pleasantly to her and told her she was a bonnie lassie. Where is Cornea?" "In her room. John, she went to breakfast this morning for her and she took a walk together on the battery."

"Cornelia shall not have anything to do with him." "Very good. I must look after that young fellow. But he said the doctor without much care, and Mrs. Moran was not satisfied. "Then you do not disapprove the meeting, John?" "No, I do not disapprove the meeting, John. But she said the doctor without much care, and Mrs. Moran was not satisfied. "Yes, Geo. Hyde has too many objectionable qualities. His father is an Englishman of the most pronounced type and this young man is quite like him. I want no English in my family."

"I have been many Dutch married, but I have never seen a Dutchman who is so much like an Englishman. That is a different thing. The Dutch, as a race, have every desirable quality. The English are natural enemies. But such an alliance is quite like him. I want no English in my family."

Thomas Payne, an Englishman in those days, was before Judge Thompson, in St. George's churchyard, on the charge of thrashing John Payne in his own country, he had been thrashed by him, whenever he chose. His wife, who brought the charge against him, testified in his favor. The court, in the Circuit Court. In order to get himself with his family and the court, from Conbridge, he was granted the court's jurisdiction until he fulfilled his promise to deed his wife one of their farms.
