

A LOVE STORY BY AMELIA E. BARR

(Copyright, 1906, by Amelia E. Barr)

CHAPTER IV.—(Continued.)

"My dear, dear grandfather, you carry wisdom with you! Oh, wise, wise grandfather! You have made me happy to a degree!"

"Very well, but say not that I give you such counsel. When I speak to you, it is as certain to do, then I will say such and such words to him, but my words in your mouth will be a great offense to justly for so he is hard to carry words, and carry nothing else. Your dear mother—how is she?"

"Well and happy. My father is not so happy. I can see that he is worried of everything."

"Not here, in his hand. It is in England. If of Liberty I now speak to him, he has a smile so hopeless that both bad and angry it makes me. No faith has he left for me, except Washington, and I think, also, he is disappointed that Washington was not crowned King George the First."

"O you dear, dear grandmamma, and he stood up, and lifted her hand between his hands and kissed her."

"I see she was a month old. I have known her for this morning, and I am glad to borrow for her Aunt Jacobs my ivory winder. For thy mamma's sake, she cannot take this evening to Aunt."

"I am sure you will give me a reason why."

"O you dear, dear grandmamma, and he stood up, and lifted her hand between his hands and kissed her."

that he could visit her at any hour of the day, without a ceremonious invitation.

"I look a merry leave of Arenta, and went directly to his rooms. 'This my destiny! 'Tis my happy destiny to give you such counsel. When I speak to you, it is as certain to do, then I will say such and such words to him, but my words in your mouth will be a great offense to justly for so he is hard to carry words, and carry nothing else. CHAPTER V.

"Turning Over a New Leaf. When Hyde awakened, he was in that borderland between dreams and day which we call twilight."

"I am more alive than ever in my life," he said, and he laughed gaily, and went to the window to look at the day, and that so much in his joy," he added, "for it is my birthday. Coriella would not leave his house."

First Sprays of the Apple.

The practice of spraying trees and shrubs when they are in the coming widespread. It has been recognized that in this way many of the most serious diseases of the trees can be kept from spreading themselves in the fruit, leaves or the wood. Just what efficacy there is in this spraying is still a matter of debate, but it is believed that much good results. Winter spraying is inclusive of that done at any time before the buds are swelling. Even many people that are in doubt about the wisdom of spraying trees when dormant, yet follow the practice, to be on the safe side. It is certain that, if, as some have supposed, the spores which spray and are on the bark of the tree or on rubbish on the ground, spraying will do good.

The method is prepared to spray in the winter as follows: When dormant, yet follow the practice, to be on the safe side. It is certain that, if, as some have supposed, the spores which spray and are on the bark of the tree or on rubbish on the ground, spraying will do good.

He flung up the case, and "for me," continued Hyde. The next generation may say Mr. Madison, or Mr. Monroe or Mr. Jay, but they will not mention your name, Mr. Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, and if you permit me, sir—Adams."

The Vice President was much pleased. He said "Good!" and stood up and stepped loftily across the porch rail, but the subtle compliment went warm to his heart.

When I have finished, heartily, and from our souls, we must do our best, and then trust to Truth and Time, your name and our memory. There must be no fainting-out affairs, as there are no holidays."
