CHAPTER XI.

We Have Done With Tears and Treasons.

"Here is a letter from Arenta," repeated the Doctor to his wife...

Doctor drove rapidly to Maiden Lane and did not stop at the apartment...

"Oh, how well I can imagine Amanda's hurry and distress," said Cornelia.

"Very well, my dear," said she, "I will also look in at Mrs. Moran's house."

"I am not a girl, madame. And I did not treat your grandson badly," said the doctor.

"I have told you the truth about my leaving because I have just had a quarrel with my father..."

"I understand," he said, when he had heard the letter. "She is frightened, poor little thing..."

"I am very sorry," he said simply, and let her hand drop...

"Why do you do that?" he asked angrily. "Because I must do it, father, I cannot help it..."

"I don't know," he said, "I am very sorry, but I must do it..."

"I am very sorry," he said simply, and let her hand drop...

"I don't know," he said, "I am very sorry, but I must do it..."

"I don't know," he said, "I am very sorry, but I must do it..."

WIT AND WISDOM.

A fool requires more watching than a knave. To hunt for pleasure is the hardest kind of work.

A woman's hysterics is no respecter of time or place. Invalidism is often the ticket of leave for laziness.

The best thing that one can sometimes say is—nothing. A fool requires more watching than a knave.
